This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

YOUNG AND ANOTHER (Trustees of Buccleuch-Greyfriars Free Church), and GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF UNITED FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND (Pursuers), Respondents.—D.-F. Asher—Haldane, K.C.—Guthrie, K.C.—Orr.

Church—Dissenting Church—Union of two dissenting Churches—Abandonment of fundamental principle—Property claimed by minority.—In 1843 a majority of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland (consisting of ministers and elders elected by the Presbyteries) in consequence of certain decisions of the Civil Courts which they considered to interfere with the constitution and spiritual independence of the Church, protested and withdrew from the Establishment, maintaining in other respects the doctrines, polity, and discipline of the Established Church, and claiming to be the Church of Scotland free from State control. They along with others adhering to them formed the Free Church. Large sums were, at the Disruption and subsequently, contributed for the purposes of the Free Church.

On 30th October 1900 the General Assembly of the Free Church, with consent of a majority of the Presbyteries, passed an Act agreeing to a union with the United Presbyterian Church, and relative Acts followed transferring the property of the Free Church to trustees for the new United Church.

A small minority of the Assembly of the Free Church, regarding the Acts as incompetent, protested against and dissented from them, and professed to act as the Assembly of the Free Church. On 14th December 1900 they raised an action in name of the General Assembly of the Free Church against the General Trustees of the Free Church and the General Trustees of the United Free Church and its Assembly, concluding for declarator that the United Free Church had no right to the lands, property, or funds of the Free Church, and that the pursuers were and lawfully represented the Free Church, and were entitled to its property and funds.

The ground of action was that the funds had been contributed in trust for the purposes of the Free Church as a Church distinguished from the other Churches in Scotland by a certain constitution and as holding certain principles.

Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun.
Macalister v. Young.

The pursuers contended—

I. That the Free Church was distinguished from the United Free Church—(1) In holding that under the doctrine of the Headship of the Lord Jesus Christ over the nation it was the duty of the State to see that its subjects were provided with religious ordinances in accordance with God's Word: (2) In holding as a creed the Westminster Confession of Faith in its entirety, and in requiring from each minister and elder at ordination a declaration of his belief that the whole doctrine of the Confession of Faith was the truth of God, and that he would constantly adhere thereto.

II. That the General Assembly of the Free Church had no legislative power to depart from the doctrines of the Confession or the constitution of the Church, in respect that the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland at the Disruption had no such power; that the members of the Free Church Assembly were bound as office-bearers to adhere to the Confession of Faith; and that the written commission which they held to sit in the Assembly only authorised them to consult and vote in accordance with the Word of God, the Constitution of the Church, and the Confession of Faith.

III. That, on the other hand, the United Presbyterian Church had from its foundation in 1847 constantly maintained that it is not within the province of Civil Government to provide for the religious instruction of the subject, and that that department of the education of the young belongs exclusively to the parents and to the Churches—and had not departed from these views in entering into the United Church, and that the United Church in leaving the question open could not be regarded as holding the doctrine of the Free Church in this respect.

IV. That the United Free Church did not hold the Confession of Faith in its entirety, but as qualified by certain declaratory Acts.

V. That its ministers and elders were no longer required to adhere to the whole doctrine of the Confession of Faith, but to the doctrine of the United Free Church as contained in the Confession of Faith, thus leaving it open to the Church Courts to alter or curtail its doctrine.

The position taken by the United Free Church in defence was—

(1) That the doctrines of the original Free Church did not include the doctrine that it was the duty of the State to maintain a Church:

(2) That even if they did, it was not a fundamental doctrine of the Church:

(3) That the United Free Church had not departed from the doctrines of the Confession:

(4) That the original Free Church held as its fundamental principle the Headship of Christ and the supreme authority of His Word over the Church, and that the Assembly had power, and was bound from time to time as might be necessary, to deal with the doctrines of the Church by legislation.

Both parties produced documentary evidence, and quoad ultra renounced probation.

Evidence upon which held (rev. judgment of the Second Division), diss. Lords Macnaghten and Lindley, (1) that the Free Church of 1843 held as one of its fundamental and distinctive doctrines the duty of the State to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's Word; (2) that the Free Church Assembly, with consent of a majority of the Presbyteries, was not entitled to depart from this doctrine and to make it an open question, and to share the funds of the Free Church with another Church which did not hold this doctrine, and, further, was not entitled to deprive the minority of their rights in the funds because they refused to hold the doctrine an open question and to enter into the United Church; and therefore (3) that neither the United Free Church nor any of its members had right to any part of the property belonging to the Free Church.

Per the Lord Chancellor—"Among all Christian Churches the essential idea of a creed or confession of faith appears to be the public acknowledgment of such and such religious views as the bond of union which binds them together as one Christian community."

FIRST APPEAL.

(IN the Court of Session, Bannatyne v. The United Free Church of Scotland, July 19, 1902, 4 F. 1083.)

On 14th December 1900 the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland and the Rev. Colin A. Bannatyne, Moderator, and Others, raised an action against Lord Overtoun and Others, the General Trustees of the Free Church, the General Trustees of the United Free Church, and the General Assembly of the United Free Church, concluding, inter alia, for declarator—"(3) That the said United Free Church of Scotland has no right, title, or interest in any part of the lands, property, or funds" held for the Free Church prior to the Union. "(6) That the pursuers and those adhering to and lawfully associated with them conform to the constitution of the Free Church of Scotland are and lawfully represent the said Free Church of Scotland, and are entitled to have the whole of said lands, property, and funds applied according to the terms of the trusts upon which they are respectively held for behoof of themselves and those so adhering to and associated with them, and their successors, as constituting the true and lawful Free Church of Scotland, and that the defenders . . . the General Trustees foresaid, or the defenders second enumerated, or those of the defenders in whose hands or under whose control the said lands, property, and funds may be for the time being, are bound to hold and apply the same for behoof of the pursuers and those adhering to and associated with them as aforesaid, and subject to the lawful orders of the General Assembly of the said Free Church of Scotland . . . and in particular that they are bound to denude themselves of the whole of said lands, property, and funds in favour of such parties as may be nominated as general trustees by a General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, but subject always to the trusts upon which the said lands, property, and funds were respectively held by the said defenders for behoof of the Free Church of Scotland as at 30th October 1900."

On 9th August 1901 the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) dismissed the action.

The pursuers reclaimed.

Both parties produced documentary evidence, and quoad ultra renounced probation.

On 4th July 1902 the Second Division recalled Lord Low's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers presented the present appeal.

SECOND APPEAL.

(IN the Court of Session, see United Free Church of Scotland v. M'Iver (Aultbea case), July 19, 1902, 4 F. 1117.)

This action was brought by Robert Young and Another, as trustees for the congregation of the United Free Church formerly occupying Free Buccleuch and Greyfriars Church, and by the Rev. Robert Rainy, Moderator of the General Assembly of the United Free Church, against the Rev. D. M. Macalister and the Rev. Robert Gordon, the ministers of the Free Church occupying the church, and certain office-bearers, for declarator that the church belonged to the pursuers, and for interdict against Mr Macalister and Mr Gordon preaching in the church.

No. 1.

Macalister v. Young.

The church was held by the trustees under the Model Trust Deed, and this action, with three other similar actions, was brought by the United Free Church to determine their right to four churches.

The Second Division, in accordance with their judgment in the action by the Free Church above mentioned, granted decree in favour of the United Free Church, the pursuers in these four actions. One of the actions (the Aultbea case) is reported 4 F. 1117.

The present appeal was brought in another, the Buccleuch and Greyfriars Church case, by the Rev. D. M. Macalister and others, the defenders.

The two appeals were heard together. The documentary evidence for the purposes of this report is sufficiently given in the judgments. It is fully quoted in an appendix to the report in L. R. [1904], A. C. 515. A verbatim report of the argument is given in a separate report of the case entitled "The Free Church of Scotland Appeals, 1903-4," edited by Mr R. L. Orr, K.C.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the pursuers complain of a breach of trust, the trust being for the behoof of the Free Church of Scotland, and the breach of trust alleged is that certain property is no longer used for the behoof of the Free Church of Scotland, but for the maintenance and support of another and a different body, namely, the United Free Church. That body was formed in 1900, and consisted of a certain number of those who professed to belong to the Free Church of Scotland and others who, up to the time of the union, had belonged to the United Presbyterian body. They purported to unite and to exclude from their Communion, or at all events from all participation in their organisation, those who refused to unite in the new body, and have of course used the funds of which they claim to be the beneficial owners for the use of the new united body.

This is the breach of trust complained of, and the question is whether that complaint is well founded.

Now, in one sense there can be no doubt what was the original purpose of the trust. It was for the maintenance and support of the Free Church of Scotland.

What was the Free Church of Scotland in 1843 can hardly admit of doubt. The reasons which those who then separated themselves from the Established Church of Scotland then gave for their separation are recorded with distinctness and precision, and I do not think there can be any doubt of the principles and faith of those who came out from the Church of Scotland and described themselves as the Free Church of Scotland. Their name was significant; they claimed to be still the Church of Scotland, but freed from interference by the State in matters spiritual.

It was to the persons thus describing themselves that the funds in dispute were given, and until the union of 1900 with the other body we do not hear of any difficulty having arisen in the administration of the trust.

Now, however, the new body has established a new organisation; it is alleged to profess new doctrines; and its identity with the Free Church, for whose behoof the property was settled, is disputed; and it accordingly becomes necessary to consider in what consists the identity of the body designated by the donors of the fund as the Free Church of Scotland.

Speaking generally, one would say that the identity of a religious community described as a Church must consist in the unity of its doctrines. Its creeds, confessions, formularies, tests, and so forth, are apparently intended to ensure the unity of the faith which its adherents profess, and certainly among all Christian Churches the essential idea of a creed or confession of faith appears to be the public acknowledgment of such and such religious views as the bond of union which binds them together as one Christian community.

If this be so, there is no lack of material from which to deduce the identity of the Free Church of Scotland. Its founders left their Claim, Declaration, and Protest to stand for all time as a clear exposition both of their reasons for leaving the Church of Scotland when they did leave it and as a profession of their faith as the true Church of Scotland though separated from the Establishment, which in their view was itself heretical from its submission to the temporal power in what they regarded as exclusively spiritual.

Now, in the controversy which has arisen it is to be remembered that a Court of law has nothing to do with the soundness or unsoundness of a particular doctrine. Assuming there is nothing unlawful in the views held—a question which, of course, does not arise here—a Court has simply to ascertain what was the original purpose of the trust.

I do not think we have any right to speculate as to what is or is not important in the views held. The question is what were in fact the views held and what the founders of the trust thought important.

Fortunately your Lordships have the authority of most learned Judges—their decisions now reaching back for something like a century—which I shall quote somewhat copiously, as laying down the principle upon which such questions as are now in debate should be determined.

Commenting on what Lord Eldon said, Lord Moncreiff in Scotland, and Sir William Cusack Smith in Ireland, have expressed themselves in a manner which I think may be well applied to the matter now in debate.

Lord Eldon said (Craigdallie v. Aikman[1]):—"With respect to the doctrine of the English law on this subject, if property was given in trust for A, B, C, &c., forming a congregation for religious worship; if the instrument provided for the case of a schism, then the Court would act upon it; but if there was no such provision in the instrument, and the congregation happened to divide, he did not find that the law of England would execute the trust for a religious society, at the expense of a forfeiture of their property by the cestuis que trust, for adhering to the opinions and principles in which the congregation had originally united. He found no case which authorised him to say that the Court would enforce such a trust not for those who adhered to the original principles of the society but merely with a reference to the majority; and much less if those who changed their opinions, instead of being a majority, did not form one in ten of those who had originally contributed, which was the principle here. He had met with no case that would enable him to say that the adherents to the original opinions should under such circumstances for that adherence forfeit their rights.

"If it were distinctly intended that the Synod should direct the use of the property, that ought to have been matter of contract, and then the Court might act upon it; but there must be evidence of such a contract, and here he could find none. He proposed, therefore, that the cause should be sent back with two findings of this nature—1st. That the ground appeared to have been purchased and the house built for a society united and proposing to continue united in religious opinion. 2d. That it did not in point of fact appear how this property was to be applied in case the society should happen to differ and separate."

Lord Moncreiff said in Craigie v. Marshall (Kirkintilloch case),[1] quoting Lord Eldon in Craigdallie v. Aikman[2]:—"'If it were distinctly intended that the Synod should direct the use of the property, that ought to have been matter of contract, and then the Court might act upon it; but there must be evidence of such a contract, and here he could find none.' He therefore proposed to remit the cause with two findings. Accordingly it was remitted with very precise findings, importing that it appeared sufficiently as matter of fact that the ground was purchased and was to be used for religious worship 'by a number of persons agreeing at the time in their religious opinions and persuasions, and therefore intending to continue in communion with each other'; and that the society had acceded to a body called the Associate Synod; but that it did not appear as matter of fact 'for what purpose it was intended at the time such purchase and erections were made, or at the time such accession took place, that the ground and buildings should be used and enjoyed, in case the whole body of persons using and enjoying the same should change their religious principles and persuasions, or if in consequence of the adherence of some such persons to their original religious principles and persuasions, and the non-adherence of others thereto, such persons should cease to agree in their original principles and persuasions, and should cease to continue in communion with each other, and should cease, either as to the whole body, or as to any part of the members, &c., to adhere to the Associate Synod.' With these findings the cause was remitted for further consideration.

"There is no ambiguity in the principles on which Lord Eldon made this remit. Under the remit the Court ordered a condescendence with a view to the ascertainment of the matters of fact—whether there was a real difference in the religious principles or not; and afterwards pronounced an interlocutor, the result of which was that the Court found that the pursuers 'have failed to condescend upon any acts done or opinions professed by the Associate Synod, or by the defenders, from which this Court, as far as they are capable of understanding the subject, can infer, much less find, that the defenders have deviated from the original principles and standards of the Associate Presbytery and Synod; farther find that the pursuers have failed to render intelligible to the Court on what ground it is that they aver that there does exist at this moment any real difference between their principles and those of the defenders,' &c.; and therefore found it unnecessary to enter into the inquiries which had been directed by the House of Lords, under the supposition that the defenders had departed from the original standards and principles of the Association."

In Dill v. Watson[1] Smith, B., in Ireland, on the same subject, said—"Again, I do not conceive that I appeal from the Word of God to that of man by proclaiming or attesting by my signature that I concur in the interpretation given by a numerous body of my fellow Christians to certain passages of Scripture. They agree with me, I agree with them in construction and consequent creed: but neither take their belief upon the authority of those others. Both draw their faith from the Bible as its common source; both consider the Bible as containing the only rule of and furnishing the only unerring guide to a true faith; each, with God's assistance and the subordinate and pious aid of human instruction, interprets as well as man's infirmity will permit; both coincide in the same interpretation; that interpretation regulates their faith; and all who thus coincide become members of the same religion. And thirdly, we do not coerce our neighbour by calling for his signature to our profession or articles of faith. We leave him free to adopt or to repudiate that faith, according as his reason, his conscience, and the grace of God may direct him. We but say to him, if you agree with us affix your signature to certain articles, or in some way notify your recognition of their truth; or if you disagree withhold such signature or declaration. And we say of him, in the former case that he is, and in the latter case that he is not of our religion. We do not compel him to hold our faith; we but ask him to inform us by certain acts whether he does hold it or does not; and we ask this only if he claim to be enrolled as one of our body and to be in religious communion with us. In the absence of such a test our Establishment would not be a rock, cemented into solidity by harmonious uniformity of opinion; it would be a mere incongruous heap of, as it were, grains of sand thrown together without being united; each of these intellectual and isolated grains differing from every other; and the whole forming a but nominally united while really unconnected mass; fraught with nothing but internal dissimilitude and mutual and reciprocal contradiction and dissension. Hic dextrorsum abit; ille sinistrorsum. This indeed I should hold to be, in the language of a late prelate, 'a Church without a religion.'"

The principles for decision thus propounded have been recognised and acted upon ever since, and it would seem that it may be laid down that no question of the majority of persons can affect the question, but the original purposes of the trust must be the guide.

Under these circumstances, it would seem to reduce the question in dispute to an examination of the evidence as to what is the difference between them, if any, and if that difference does or does not accord with the original purpose of the trust; but in examining this question one has to bear in mind not what we or any other Court might think of the importance of the difference, but what the donors of the trust fund thought about it, or what we are constrained to infer would be their view of it if it were possible to consult them.

The first point in dispute is very plainly set forth by the pursuers in the 13th Condescendence.

After pointing out in the 10th Condescendence that the Free Church of Scotland was a voluntary association or body of Christians associated together under a definite contract involving the maintenance of definite principles, the 13th Condescendence proceeds thus:—"As already stated, one of the essential principles recognised by those who associated themselves to form the Free Church of Scotland, emphasised by their leaders in their utterances at the time of the Disruption, and embodied in the contract of association or constitution of said Church as hereinbefore defined, is that it is the duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's Word; and the said Church as originally associated recognised and maintained the propriety and advantage of the endowment of pastoral charges and the promotion of religious education by the State. The principle of the duty of the recognition of religion by the State by means of the establishment, and, where possible, endowment of a national Church, was moreover implicitly involved in the position claimed by the Free Church as being the Church of Scotland freed merely from the control of the Civil Courts in matters spiritual. The said principle formed an essential principle of the Free Church of Scotland, and its maintenance was one of the main reasons for the formation of that Church as a separate association or body of Christians, distinct and apart from those who professed themselves to be 'voluntaries.' There were several such associations of seceders from the Established Church of Scotland in existence at the time of the Disruption of 1843, holding views practically identical with those of the founders of the Free Church in matters of doctrine and as to the encroachments of the Civil Courts, but differing from them as regarded the duty above referred to. In regard to this, these bodies were 'voluntaries' in the sense of holding such action of the State to be unlawful. The foundation of the Free Church was a protest against the position of such churches on the one hand, just as it was against the encroachments of the civil power on the other."

In reply to this the defenders say:—"The Confession of Faith does not contain or set forth the said alleged principle in respect to the rights and duty of the civil magistrate in regard to establishments of religion as an article of faith or doctrine or belief. It teaches that nations and their rulers are bound to own the authority of Christian truth, but the Free Church has always held that the teaching of the Confession in this matter is to be read and understood in harmony with the principle (which the Confession also teaches) that the Christian Church has an independent government and jurisdiction in matters spiritual, distinct from the civil magistrate, and also in harmony with the view that the Confession is not to be accepted as favouring intolerance or persecution or interfering with liberty of conscience. The alleged principle as to the right and duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an establishment of religion has always been in the Free Church an open question in regard to which liberty of opinion has been permitted and exercised, and as to which wide differences of opinion have all along prevailed." These, then, are the two contentions upon which the first part of the controversy depends.

I cannot doubt that upon this head there is an overwhelming body of evidence in favour of the pursuers. Indeed, two of the learned Judges have stated in express terms that originally the Free Church did profess what has been conveniently called the Establishment principle, though, for reasons which will be dealt with hereafter, they do not think that those who now represent the Free Church are bound by that original opinion.

I am unable to understand by what test I am to ascertain what the donor of a fund has made essential to his gift unless it is by what he has said or written, and when I find that the Free Church invited support by the circulation of Dr Chalmers' Address, what can I say but that he expresses the views of the Church that he represents?—"By giving up your connection with the State, and thus separating yourselves from the worldly advantages of such a connection, you may be said to have withstood a great temptation to sin in one form; but such is the deceitfulness of the human heart that, without the heedfulness and the humility which apostles of old so pressed upon the early converts, there is danger of being carried away by temptation in another form—and temptation, too, to the very same sin. Rather than be seduced from one of your greatest principles, you have given up one earthly dependence; but let principle have its perfect work, and have a care lest you be tempted from even the best (ought to be 'least') of your principles by the promises and the allurements of another earthly dependence. Rather than compromise the authority of Christ over the affairs of His own Church, you have forfeited the countenance of men in power, that is, who have the power of this world's authority on their side. Beware of compromising another of your doctrines or articles of faith; and in the defence of which the Church of Scotland did lately signalise herself under the authority of Christ, over the kings and governments of earth, and the counterpart of this government, to uphold religion in the world—beware, we say, of making any compromise or surrender of this your other principle, and this too, to gain the countenance of those who may still be called men in power, that is, who have the power, if not of authority and office, have at least the power of numbers on their side. This may be termed a less principle than the other, of inferior consideration in itself, and inferior consequence to the vital or spiritual wellbeing of Christ's Church upon earth. But let us not forget what the Bible says of those who break even the least of the commandments, that they shall be called least in the Kingdom of Heaven. The men who stand opposed to us on this second, or, as many choose to term it, this secondary question, might, with all the hay and stubble and wood of this, and it may be of other errors, be reposing on the like precious foundation with ourselves. They might be men with whom we differ and yet with whom we can agree to differ. They might be coadjutors in the great work of evangelising the people of our land—brethren with whom we can hold sweet and profitable counsel on the capita fidei or weightier matters of the law, having one faith, and one Lord, and one baptism. But we shall not, even for their friendship, violate the entireness of our principles, or make surrender of the very least of them. It is not for those ministers of Christ whom I am now addressing, and who, on the altar of principle have just laid down their all—thus quitting, and for the sake of one principle, the friendship of men who have the power of office—it is not for them to give up another principle for the sake of courting the friendship of men who have the power of numbers. We must not thus transfer ourselves from one earthly dependence to another. We have no other dependence than God. We acknowledge the authority and will submit to the influence of no other guide than His eternal and unalterable truth as seen in the light of our own consciences. To be more plain, let me be more particular. The Voluntaries mistake us if they conceive us to be Voluntaries. We hold by the duty of Government to give of their resources and their means for the maintenance of a gospel ministry in the land; and we pray that their eyes may be opened so as that they may learn how to acquit themselves as the protectors of the Church, and not as its corruptors or its tyrants. We pray that the sin of Uzziah, into which they have fallen, may be forgiven them; and that those days of light and blessedness may speedily arrive when kings shall be the nursing fathers and queens the nursing mothers of our Zion. In a word, we hold that every part and every function of a commonwealth should be leavened with Christianity; and that every functionary, from the highest to the lowest, should, in their respective spheres, do all that lies in them to countenance and uphold it. That is to say, though we quit the Establishment, we go out on the Establishment principle—we quit a vitiated Establishment, but would rejoice in returning to a pure one. To express it otherwise, we are the advocates for a national recognition and a national support of religion, and we are not voluntaries."

It would probably be admitted by all that the authority of Dr Chalmers as an exponent of the views of the Free Church could hardly be overrated, but it was not his personal view merely. The words were addressed by him as Moderator, and were adopted unanimously, and directed to be circulated by the Assembly.

I am reluctant to render longer what I have to say by literal quotations from authoritative declarations of the Free Church, but though I summarise I am actually using the language which originally, and for a long period afterwards, those who spoke on behalf of the Free Church have said and written:—

"The Free Church has ever highly valued her connection with the State." "Firmly asserts the right and duty of the Civil Magistrate to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's word." "They" (the Free Church) "reserve to themselves and their successors to strive by all lawful means to secure the performance of this duty." "The State was bound to establish and endow the Church." "The Free Church has not in the least degree altered its views respecting the lawfulness and the desirableness of a right connection between Church and State." "History and experience have convinced us" (the Free Church) "that there is a form of alliance which is at once practicable and agreeable to Scripture, and highly beneficial."

I cannot doubt that each of the utterances I have quoted is important, and to my mind conclusive, evidence that originally at all events the views of the founders of the trust were in favour of the Establishment principle.

The question whether they were fundamental or susceptible of being changed demands a separate treatment, which as it is applicable to both questions in debate must be reserved for the present.

Now, the views of the United Presbyterian Church cannot be more definitely or more shortly stated than in their own language authoritatively stated by themselves and before their union with the Free Church:—"It is not competent," they say, "to the civil magistrate to give legislative sanction to any creed in the way of setting up a Civil Establishment of religion, nor is it either his province to provide for the expense of the ministration of religion out of the national resources. It is Jesus Christ as sole King and Head of His Church who has enjoined upon His people to provide for maintaining and extending it by freewill offerings; that this being the ordinance of Christ it excludes State aid for these purposes, and that adherence to it is the true safeguard of the Church's independence."

In my view what follows does not at all qualify this passage, but in fairness it ought to be added:—"Moreover, though uniformity of opinion with respect to civil establishments of religion is not a term of communion in the United Presbyterian Church, yet the views on this subject held and universally acted upon are opposed to these institutions."

Here, we have the two bodies which are supposed to establish identity of religious belief, the one asserting the right and duty to maintain and support an establishment of religion, the other asserting that Christ's ordinance excludes State aid; each of them therefore treats the question as one of religious belief and obligation, and not one from which religious duties are excluded.

The second question in debate is the difference between the two bodies as to the two doctrines known as the Calvinistic and the Arminian doctrine of Predestination. I use these two phrases, subject to more ample exposition hereafter, in order to summarise what I have to say, as preliminary to the discussion of the subject itself.

I regret very much that we have not any opinion from the learned Judges whose judgments we are called upon to review. I am afraid, speaking for myself, I do not think it is competent to me to avoid dealing with it. It is included in the allegation of a departure from the doctrines which is complained of in the summons, and it has been argued before your Lordships with great learning and ability. One observation made by the learned counsel I entirely agree to, namely, that in discussing this subject one cannot ignore the contemporaneous theological discussions at the time the Confession of Faith was compiled.

Now, the doctrine in dispute was the subject of a copious amount of literature all through the seventeenth century.

Looking, then, at the history of the particular dispute which is brought into debate, it cannot be said that the language of the Confession of Faith was lightly drawn or arrived at without long debate and deliberation.

Indeed, it may be said of the Westminster Confession as a whole that it was composed with a deliberate and careful scrutiny which may be regarded as hardly equalled in any theological discussion, and though councils of the Church have lasted longer, yet if one regards the composition of the Assembly itself, the original parties to the discussion, the presentation of its different portions to Parliament, the adoption of it by Parliament, and afterwards by the Church of Scotland, these things give an overwhelming sanction to it, and, at all events, to its original meaning by those who were content to accept it as a test of the unity of their religious belief.

If this observation is true and applicable to the Confession of Faith as a whole (the minute report of its deliberations has been deciphered by the distinguished Director and Principal Librarian of the British Museum), the particular doctrine debated as part of the code of belief which the Free Church adopted in 1843, and which it is alleged that the United Free Church has abandoned, can hardly be said to be one which any Christian Church could regard as a matter of indifference. It divided the Dutch Reformed Church at the beginning of the seventeenth century. It proved the subject of debate at the Hague in 1611, and at Delft in 1613.

An edict of the States of Holland sought to put an end to the controversy, but in vain; and finally, in 1619, ten years after the death of Arminius, or Harmensen, as was his real name, the Arminian heresy, as it was described, was publicly condemned. Its professors were denounced as liars and deceivers, and those who participated in it were deprived of their civil rights unless they retracted.

James the First is said to have procured the exile of Conrad Vorstius, one of the protagonists of the Arminian doctrines, and afterwards he wrote a pamphlet against him, and argued that he ought to be put to death for his unchristian doctrines, while, on the other hand, the Councils of Constantinople in 1642 and the Council of Jerusalem in 1672 pronounced the following opinions:—

Treating of what they describe as the Calvinistic doctrine—Councils of Constantinople, 1642—Cap. 3:—

"τὸν Θεὸν ὑποτίθησιν ἀδικώτατον, τυραννικῇ χρώμενον ἐξουσίᾳ, μόνῃ λέγων τῇ θελήσει αὐτοῦ τοὺς μὲν εἰς δόξαν προορίσαι, τοὺς δὲ ἀποβάλλειν εἰς κόλασιν, μηδαμῶς τὰ ἔργα αὐτῶν σκοπούμενον, οὗ τί ἂν γένοιτο ἀσεβέστερον;"

"Deum facit iniquissimum, tyrannica potestate utentem, aiens eum sola sua voluntate alios prædestinare ad gloriam, alios in pœnam mittere, nulla operum habita ratione. Quo quid magis impium proferri possit?"

The Synod of Jerusalem in 1672 said (extract from cap. 3):—

"ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ τὴν θείαν θέλησιν αἰτίαν εἶναι τῶν καταπρινομένων οὕτως ἁπλῶς καὶ ἀναιτίως ποίαν οὐκ ἔχει μανίαν; ποίαν οὐκ ἐπιφέρει κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ συκοφαντίαν, καὶ ποίαν εἰς τὸ ὕψος οὐ λαλεῖ ἀδικίαν, καὶ βλασφημίαν; ἀπείρατον μὲν γὰρ κακῶν τὸ Θεῖον, καὶ πάντων ἐξ ἴσου ἔθελον τὴν σωτηρίαν, ὡς μὴ ἰσχύσης χώραν τῆς προσωποληψίας παρ' αὐτῷ οἴδαμεν: τοῖς βιβήλοις γενομένοις σκεύεσι διὰ μοχθηρὰν αὐτῶν προαίρεσιν, καὶ ἀμετανόητον καρδίαν, ὡς δίκαιον παραχωρεῖν τὴν κατάκρισιν ὁμολογοῦμεν. κολάσεως δ' αἰωνίου, ὠμότητός τε καὶ ἀσπλαγχνίας, καὶ μισανθρωπίας αἴτιον, οὔποτε, οὔποτε φαμὲν τὸν Θεὸν, τὸν χαρὰν γίνεσθαι ἐν οὐρανῷ ἐπὶ ἑνὶ μετανοοῦντι ἁμαρτωλῷ ἀποφηνάμενον. μὴ γένοιτο ἡμᾶς οὕτως ἢ πιστεῦσαι, ἢ ἐννοῆσαι ἕως ἂν ἑαυτῶν ἐσμὲν ἀναθέματι δὲ αἰωνίῳ καθυποβάλλομεν τοὺς τὰ τοιαῦτα καὶ λέγοντας, καὶ φρονοῦντας, καὶ χείρους πάντων ἀπίστων γινώσκομεν."

"Sed et hominum ita simpliciter ac sine caussa damnatorum auctorem statuere divinam voluntatem, insania quanta? Quæ major Deo calumnia inferatur? Quanta in supremum Numen injuria, quanta blasphemia? Quippe intentatorem malorum non esse Deum, et omnium ex æquo salutem velle ceu apud quem personarum acceptio nulla est, cognoscimus: et his qui pravis voluntatis suæ moribus ac secundum impœnitens cor se vasa in contumeliam effecere damnationem juste decerni confitemur. Æternæ autem punitionis, immanitatis, duritiæ et inhumanitatis nusquam, nusquam dicimus auctorem esse Deum, super uno peccatore pœnitentiam agente esse in cœlo gaudium, afferentem. Absit a nobis ita cogitare, nedum credere, quamdiu nostri compotes sumus: immo vero talia dicentes ac sentientes anathemati sempiterno subjicimus, et cunctis infidelibus pejores agnoscimus."

I quote from the edition of the Councils of the Church published in Venice by two Jesuit Fathers in 1728, who have appended to the originals their own Latin translation.

It was in this state of the controversy agitating the Christian Church throughout the world that the Confession of Faith was adopted by the Church of Scotland on the 27th of August 1647, and the approval and adoption of it was made in a form which was intended to prevent cavil as to its being agreed upon without objection or doubt. It recites that the Confession was twice publicly read over, examined, and considered, that copies were printed that it might be sedulously perused by all members of the Assembly, unto whom frequent intimation was publicly made to put in their objections and doubts, if they had any; and the said Confession being, upon due examination thereof, found by the Assembly to be most agreeable to the Word of God, and in nothing contrary to the received doctrines, worship, discipline, and government of this Kirk, it proceeds to adopt it as a Confession of Faith for the three Kirks of God in the three kingdoms.

I think it is only necessary to put in juxtaposition the language of the Confession of Faith itself and the statement of doctrine set forth by one component part of the supposed united body united in one faith and doctrine.

The Confession of Faith—"(CHAP. III.—Of God's Eternal Decree):—Sec. III. By the decree of God, for the manifestation of His glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death. Sec. IV. These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished."

Now, then, for the Act.—Act (Declaratory Act) anent Confession of Faith made 26th May 1892:—"That this Church also holds that all who hear the Gospel are warranted and required to believe to the saving of their souls; and that in the case of such as do not believe, but perish in their sins, the issue is due to their own rejection of the Gospel call. That this Church does not teach, and does not regard the Confession as teaching, the foreordination of men to death irrespective of their own sin."

It has been argued with great ingenuity that inasmuch as the doctrine of Predestination, as treated of in the Scriptures, is a mystery, and that various opinions have been held in respect of it, it cannot be made a test doctrine, since another doctrine may be held with it not to human intelligence reconcilable with it, but equally derived from and established by Scriptural authority. If the Scottish Church, or the Westminster Confession as one of its declarations of doctrine, had simply declared that predestination was one of its doctrines, there might be something in the argument, but the argument ignores the fact that the Westminster Confession purports to explain, and does explain, in language which does not admit of doubt, what is meant. Each party well knew what they meant. It is not a question of metaphysical subtleties or ambiguous language. Each meant to exclude and denounce the doctrine of the other.

I am therefore led to the conclusion that upon this second question the appellants are entitled to succeed.

But another question is raised which in one sense, as affecting the law of trusts and their administration, is most important.

The Dean of Faculty boldly argued for the inherent power of every Christian Church to change its doctrines, and Lord Young has based his judgment upon this proposition.

Apart from some mysterious and subtle meaning to be attached to the word "Church," and understanding it to mean an associated body of Christian believers, I do not suppose that anybody will dispute the right of any man, or any collection of men, to change their religious beliefs according to their own consciences, but when men subscribe money for a particular object and leave it behind them for the promotion of that object, their successors have no right to change the object endowed.

In this case it is suggested that the terms of what is called the Barrier Act suggest such licence to change.

I am not able to concur in such an inference.

It is obvious that dealing with such a subject as formularies, books of religious instruction, and the like, many things might be done, written, and taught, which might touch doctrine, and for the purpose of preventing any alteration in doctrine, the precautions insisted upon by the Barrier Act were thought necessary to prevent and render impossible any departure from the orthodox standards. It provides that "before any General Assembly of the Church shall pass any Acts which are to be binding Rules and Constitutions to the Church" (observe "binding Rules and Constitutions") "the same Acts be first proposed as overtures to the Assembly."

Many things might be proposed which, as "binding Rules and Constitutions," might touch doctrine, or worship, or discipline, or government, but that the Church of Scotland in 1697 might change its faith or permit it to be changed is a suggestion which to one acquainted with its history either then or even a very long time after is not very plausible. It is only just to Lord Young to say that he adds:—"I desire to say that there is, in my opinion, no rule of law to prevent a dissenting Church from abandoning a religious doctrine or principle, however essential and fundamental, or from returning to it again with or without qualification or modification. Whether or not a property title is such that a forfeiture of property will follow such abandonment or return is another matter."

But that is the whole question now before your Lordships, and as it appears to me there is nothing in calling an associated body a Church that exempts it from the legal obligations of insisting that money given for one purpose shall not be devoted to another. Any other view, it appears to me, would be fatal to the existence of every Nonconformist body throughout the country.

But there is another and a further ground upon which I think the appellants are entitled to succeed, and that is, that the so-called Union is not really an union of religious belief at all. The united body has united in its organisations. It has established its various administrative arrangements, has declared its authority as the United Free Church, and in that name has absorbed the various bodies of the United Presbyterians and the Free Church as originally constituted, but has it agreed in the doctrines of either of them, and if so, which is it that has given way?

I am bound to say that after the most careful examination of the various documents submitted to us, I cannot trace the least evidence of either of them having abandoned their original views. It is not the case of two associated bodies of Christians in complete harmony as to their doctrine agreeing to share their funds, but two bodies each agreeing to keep their separate religious views where they differ, agreeing to make their formularies so elastic as to admit those who accept them according as their respective consciences will permit.

Assuming as I do that there are differences of belief between them, these differences are not got rid of by their agreeing to say nothing about them, nor are these essentially diverse views avoided by selecting so elastic a formulary as can be accepted by people who differ and say that they claim their liberty to retain their differences while purporting to join in one Christian Church.

It becomes but a colourable union, and no trust fund devoted to one form of faith can be shared by another communion simply because they say in effect there are some parts of this or that confession which we will agree not to discuss, and we will make our formularies such that either of us can accept it.

Such an agreement would not in my view constitute a Church at all, or, it would be, to use Sir William Smith's phrase, a Church without a religion. Its formularies would be designed not to be a confession of faith but a concealment of such part of the faith as constituted an impediment to the union.

I am disposed to quote one passage from what was said by Dr William Wilson from the Moderator's Chair in 1866, and which I find in Mr A. Taylor Innes' most excellent Treatise on the Law of Creeds in Scotland.[1] Speaking of the freedom of the Church as to confessions of faith, he says:—"We are not at liberty to hold forth a confession in which we do not believe. For in such a case the Church is absolutely without a confession. . . . It ceases to be either a bond of union or a public testimony. It is lawful for the Church to revise her confession and adjust it to her present attainments and exigencies; it is lawful for her altogether to dispense with a confession, if indeed without one any organisation were possible, but to retain a confession which has ceased to be believed can never be lawful."

He is speaking of course of the Christian conscience, and as he says at an earlier period of his discourse, when the Church has arrived at the conclusion that its confession must be altered, "the time has come for us then to frame a new bond of union with each other, a new testimony to the world."

Macalister v. Young.

This would certainly not be done by making formularies ambiguous or elastic, or authorising its votaries to put different meanings upon a set of words the function of which was intended to be a test of the unity of their faith.

That this is the principle upon which the so-called Union has been arrived at is proved by the declaration of the United Church, in which they claim in effect to retain their own separate views held either in the United Presbyterian or in the Free Church, or in either of the bodies which originally composed the united body which afterwards became the United Presbyterian Church. They say this:—"(1) The various matters of agreement between the Churches with a view to union are accepted and enacted without prejudice to the inherent liberty of the United Church as a Church of Christ to determine and regulate its own constitution and laws as duty may require, in dependence on the grace of God and under the guidance of His word. . . . (3) As this Union takes place on the footing of maintaining the liberty of judgment and action heretofore recognised in either of the Churches uniting, so, in particular, it is hereby declared that members of both Churches, and also of all Churches which in time past have united with either of them, shall have full right, as they see cause, to assert and maintain the views of truth and duty which they had liberty to maintain in the said Churches."

For these reasons I think the judgment ought to be reversed, and I so move your Lordships; but I cannot conclude without expressing how much we are indebted to the learned counsel on both sides for their most able and learned argument.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am unable to agree in the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived. I do not differ from any of your Lordships as to the law; at least I think not. I accept the principles laid down in this House in Craigdallie v. Aikman,[1] and the other cases referred to during the argument. I accept those principles loyally and entirely, however much I may err in their application.

Everyone, I think, must feel that the consequences of your Lordships' decision to-day for good or evil will be far-reaching and of momentous importance,—graver, I think, and more serious than the consequences of any decision in which it has been my lot to take part. And the argument addressed to your Lordships has been worthy of the occasion. But after all, the question at issue is one of a very ordinary description. It is alleged on the one hand, and denied on the other, that there has been a breach of trust in the disposition of property. The complaint is that funds contributed and set apart for one purpose have been diverted to another and a different purpose. Such questions are of everyday occurrence, and the problem in each case must be solved by the ordinary commonplace inquiry,—What was the purpose for which the funds in dispute were collected? What was the original trust?

The funds in question in the present case represent moneys contributed for the support of the Free Church of Scotland. They represent property dedicated to the use of the Church body or voluntary association of professing Christians founded by those Ministers of the Established Church of Scotland who in 1843, on the memorable occasion known as the Disruption, withdrew from the Establishment; or, according to their own view of the transaction, separated from the State, carrying with them the greater part of the office-bearers of the Established Church and at least one-half of her members in full communion, asserting all the while for themselves and their followers in time to come the character of the ancient and true Church of Scotland. Setting forth with these lofty pretensions, they declared their adherence to the principles and practice of the Church of Scotland as regards doctrine, worship, discipline, and government untrammelled and unfettered by connection with the State and purged of every taint of Erastianism.

The question therefore seems to me to be this:—Was the Church thus purified—the Free Church—so bound and tied by the tenets of the Church of Scotland prevailing at the time of Disruption that departure from those tenets in any matter of substance would be a violation of that profession or testimony which may be called the unwritten charter of her foundation, and so necessarily involve a breach of trust in the administration of funds contributed for no other purpose but the support of the Free Church—the Church of the Disruption? Was the Free Church by the very condition of her existence forced to cling to her subordinate standards with so desperate a grip that she has lost hold and touch of the supreme standard of her faith? Was she from birth incapable of all growth and development? Was she (in a word) a dead branch and not a living Church?

This, I think, is the real and only question. But, if I may venture to say so without offence, it has been rather pushed aside and obscured by a very interesting preliminary search after a principle, if it be a principle, called for the sake of convenience, and not, I think, for the sake of clearness, "the Establishment principle," which, in my humble judgment, partakes rather of the elusive attraction of an ignis fatuus, which means much or little, just as you may choose to interpret one of the most obscure passages in the Westminster Confession, which in one aspect no Christian man, I think, would hesitate to accept, but which in the mouth of an adherent of a Church that has abandoned Establishment and separated from the State, can only mean a counsel of perfection unattainable in this world, at least until the advent of the Millennium.

Your Lordships have been furnished with a print of many Scottish statutes and a bulky volume containing the Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. I have read those documents and many others to which the attention of the House was directed with much interest and some care. I can only say that they have confirmed me in the opinion I entertained at the conclusion of the first argument—no doubt erroneously—that the judgment under appeal was right and ought to be affirmed.

I do not propose to trouble your Lordships by tracing the history of the Church of Scotland in its connection with the State from the date of the first Reformation to the time of the Disruption; that was done very ably and very fully by the learned counsel at the Bar. It is enough for me to say that during the whole period of the existence of the Church of Scotland there was a constant assertion of spiritual independence—of the right as it was termed of the Lord Jesus to reign in His own house. I will only give one instance—I might give many—and I will give an instance that occurred almost on the eve of Disruption. On the 23d of May 1838 the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland passed this resolution, which is called "Resolution anent the Independent Jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland:—The General Assembly having heard and considered the overtures on the Independent Jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland, agreed, by a majority, to the following resolution—'That the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, while they unqualifiedly acknowledge the exclusive jurisdiction of the Civil Courts in regard to the civil rights and emoluments secured by law to the Church and ministers thereof, and will ever give and inculcate implicit obedience to their decisions thereanent, do resolve that, as is declared in the Confession of Faith of this National Established Church, "The Lord Jesus as King and Head of His Church hath therein appointed a government in the hand of church officers distinct from the civil magistrate"; and that in all matters touching the doctrine, government, and discipline of this Church her judicatories possess an exclusive jurisdiction, founded on the Word of God, "which power ecclesiastical" (in the words of the Second Book of Discipline) "flows immediately from God and the Mediator Jesus Christ, and is spiritual, not having a temporal head on earth, but only Christ, the only spiritual King and Governor of His Kirk"; and they do further resolve, that this spiritual jurisdiction, and the supremacy and sole Headship of the Lord Jesus Christ on which it depends, they will assert and at all hazards defend by the help and blessing of that Great God who in the days of old enabled their fathers, amid manifold persecutions, to maintain a testimony, even to the death, for Christ's kingdom and crown; and, finally, that they will firmly enforce submission to the same upon the office-bearers and members of this Church by the execution of her laws, in the exercise of the ecclesiastical authority wherewith they are invested.'"

Thus while the Church was in connection with the State she took upon herself to declare emphatically that what she claimed was nothing less than an exclusive jurisdiction, founded on the Word of God, in all matters touching the doctrine as well as the government and discipline of the Church. The fact that this resolution was passed by a majority shews that it was carried by the vote of the party which five years later went out as the Free Church. Some may have hesitated—some dissented. The majority—the Free Church in embryo—recognised this claim of "Church power" as the governing principle of the Church.

During the period when the Church which had passed through the furnace of two Reformations was approaching her last and greatest trial, there grew up in the Church two parties—the Moderates and the Evangelicals. It was to the Evangelicals in later days that the Free Church of Scotland owed her separate existence. For a long time the Evangelical party was in a minority, and matters then went tolerably smoothly between Church and State. Ultimately in 1834 the Evangelicals gained the ascendancy. They were the party of progress, reform, and Church extension. They planted religion in remote and half-civilised districts in the Highlands of Scotland. They founded missions in all parts of the world. Their zeal and fervour were, as their adherents boasted, in striking contrast to the apathy and lukewarmness of the Moderates. When they became the dominant party they carried matters with a high hand. They passed Acts—the Veto Act and the Chapel Act—which were altogether beyond the competence of the Church as established by law; they censured and deposed ministers who obeyed the decrees of the Court of Session, they held those decrees to be encroachments on the true liberties of the Church, and actually pronounced them illegal. The State refused to admit their claims. The strong arm of the law restrained their extravagances. They still maintained that their proceedings were justified and required by the doctrine of the Headship of Christ, which was common to all the Reformed Churches, but to which they attached peculiar and extraordinary significance. Then came the protest of 1842, "the unanswered and unanswerable protest," as they called it.

It was followed by a cold and chilling reply from the Government in power, and it became evident to all thinking men that as the State would not give way, the leaders of the Assembly and those who adhered to them would have to retract their pretensions and own themselves defeated or quit the Establishment altogether. No one who knew the courage and temper of the leaders of the Assembly, no one who had caught the note of defiance and triumph sounded by Dr Chalmers at the close of the Edinburgh Convocation, could doubt what the issue would be. And now, in passing, I would call your Lordships' attention to one fact which seems to me not unworthy of notice, when Dr Chalmers' address, preached before the first Free Church Assembly, is relied upon as a sort of prospectus on the faith of which the funds of the Free Church were collected, as if the Free Church were a joint stock concern and that sermon an invitation to the public to put their money in it. Months before the Disruption actually took place, when all Scotland was looking forward with feverish anxiety to the last act of the drama, the leaders of the Evangelical party, with Dr Chalmers at their head—a great divine and an eloquent preacher, who had a wonderful faculty of organisation and something of the genius of a statesman—set about collecting funds for the needs of the Church. "Before the meeting of the General Assembly"—(I am now quoting from a book which I believe is of recognised authority)—"the members of the popular party had arranged their course of proceeding. Associations were formed throughout the whole of Scotland, and subscriptions were collected for the purpose of building churches and providing a maintenance for the ministers who were soon to lose the benefits of the national endowments. Dr Chalmers presided over the general finance committee, and acted with an energy and success which amazed even those who had best known his labours for a similar purpose in the cause of the Establishment. The thousands of circulars which he dispersed bore the following mottoes:—'Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed; I will not give sleep to my eyes, nor slumber to mine eyelids, until I find a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob. The God of Heaven He will prosper us; therefore we His servants will arise and build.'"[1]

That was the origin of the fund. Those were the winged messengers that prepared the ground and sowed the good seed. And when the Disruption took place, and appeals were made in every parish, in every nook and corner of Scotland, calling upon the people to stand by the Church of their forefathers, denouncing the tyranny of the State, describing in harrowing terms the sufferings of ministers, old and young, driven from their homes with their wives and children, forced to seek shelter in sheds and hovels, while they faithfully ministered to their flocks, and some actually dying of want and exposure, money came in abundantly in answer to the call. Dr Chalmers' address to the first Free Church Assembly was but one of a thousand—I might say, of a million—similar discourses. It was eloquent, of course. It was stirring. But I rather take leave to doubt whether the warning that I find there against Voluntaryism and against Anarchy—an evil, as the preacher truly says, more to be dreaded than Voluntaryism—was very stirring or likely of itself to evoke a generous response. The negation of dangerous principles does not, as a rule, rouse enthusiasm. Of what is called the Establishment principle as a tenet or opinion of the Free Church I shall have a word to say presently. All I want to impress upon your Lordships at this moment is that when that sermon was preached by Dr Chalmers, on an occasion more eloquent and more stirring than any appeal in words could be, the fund was already in full swing.

Then for whom and with what purpose was the money collected? Except as regards sums devoted to special purposes and special objects, the fund was all one fund. It was collected for the needs of the Free Church of Scotland. And what was the Free Church? Did it go out as a sect, or a persuasion, or a connection with peculiar tenets cut and dried, and defined in the precise language of a conveyancer? Nothing of the kind. Those who went out went forth declaring that they were not a sect but the National Church, that they were still the Church of Scotland. "We are," they said (to quote the words of Dr Candlish, one who was only second—if he was second—to Dr Chalmers himself), "we are still the Church of Scotland—the only Church that deserves the name, the only Church that can be known and recognised by the maintaining of those principles to which the Church of our fathers was true, when she was on the mountain and on the field, when she was under persecution, when she was an outcast from the world. And, believing that we are not seceders from the Church, but are the Church separated from the State—believing that we are not a sect separated from the Established Church, but that we are the Church of Scotland separating from the State, we hold ourselves entitled, without any disparagement to other religious bodies, to assume and act upon the principle that we are to maintain the character of the National Church of Scotland."[1] An impossible position, it may be said, in point of law! They went out, not as a Church, but as individuals separating from the Church, and they united again in a voluntary body of professing Christians. That may be so. But to themselves and to their adherents, and I may add to other religious bodies which were not of their communion, they supported the character of the National Church of Scotland. And supporting that character, rightly or wrongly assumed, they must be taken, I think, in regard to their own body, to have all the powers of a National Church.

Speaking for myself, I cannot form a conception of a National Church untrammelled and unfettered by connection with the State which does not at least possess the power of revising and amending the formulæ of subscription required of its own office-bearers, and the power of pronouncing authoritatively that some latitude of opinion is permissible to its members in regard to matters which, according to the common apprehension of mankind, are not matters of faith. I agree that a sect may erect any point or any punctilio however trifling and absurd into an article of faith. My position is, that the adherents of the Free Church were not a sect, and that they never made the Establishment principle an article of faith.

But I go further. This Establishment principle, whatever it is, can have no higher authority than the article of the Westminster Confession in which it is supposed to be embedded. If the Church has power to amend her Confession she can of course take occasion to declare that the Establishment principle is to be regarded as an open question in reference to which every man is at liberty to exercise his private judgment. Now, it seems to me clear that the Free Church when it came into existence claimed the power of altering and amending her Confession of Faith.

On the second argument the Dean of Faculty called your Lordships' attention to a little book entitled "Catechism on the Principles and Constitution of the Free Church of Scotland issued by authority of the General Assembly."[1] The preparation of this work was taken in hand in 1843. It was issued in December 1845 by authority of the Publication Committee. It sets forth in the forefront of an appendix the resolution of 1838, which I have already quoted. In 1847 the General Assembly approved generally of this Catechism "as containing a valuable summary of this Church's history and exhibition of her distinctive principles from the beginning of the Reformation to the present time." And the Assembly earnestly recommended its general use; so that it has an unquestionable claim to be considered a contemporaneous document, exhibiting the distinctive principles of the Free Church. Mr Taylor Innes in his valuable work on the Law of Creeds in Scotland,[2] quotes from it as a book of authority, but speaks of it as an intensely polemical volume. So it is. From beginning to end it attacks and flouts and belittles the Established Church, but the very bitterness of its tone shews that it was composed in the earliest days of Disruption. I will not weary your Lordships by quoting from it at any length, but I may remind your Lordships that it points out that the Church of Scotland as a Church on its own authority adopted the Westminster Confession, at the very time when Knox's Confession had the sanction of the State. The Catechism deals at some length with "Church power." It explains that this power is the power of the Keys. It declares that it is divided into four parts, and that the first part is "the Dogmatic power, in virtue of which the doctrine and laws of the Word are declared, and religious controversies are determined." It asks—"When is the Dogmatic power abused?" The answer is—"When it is made the pretext for a claim of infallibility and employed to subvert the right of private judgment, and when that implicit submission which is due only to the Word is demanded for Church formularies and decrees."

In an earlier passage, in a note to Q. 44, quoted by Mr Taylor Innes, there is a sly hit at the Established Church, and a sharp contrast drawn between the view of the Evangelical party and the view of the Moderates, not altogether to the advantage of the latter. "It is one thing," says the authors of the Catechism, "for the civil privileges and endowments of a Church to be tied to a Confession by civil enactments" (that was the comparative freedom of the Evangelicals), "and quite another thing for a Church itself to be so"; (that was the bondage of the Moderates and their Established Church). "In the former case the Church when she finds that any articles of her Confession are unscriptural is at liberty to renounce them, being only bound if she do to resign her temporalities. In the latter case the law allows no relief whatever for the Church in her corporate capacity when she discovers errors in her Confession, which of course is as much as to say that the Church is bound always to go absolutely upon the supposition of its soundness and to interpret the Word of God agreeably to its declarations. Under these circumstances the supreme and ultimate standard of doctrine is—not the Bible—but the Confession of Faith." I greatly fear that that is the position into which the Free Church will be driven if Mr Johnston's argument prevails.

I could easily multiply quotations from this Free Church Catechism, but I think I have quoted enough to prove that to the fathers of the Free Church movement the notion of altering the Westminster Confession of Faith was not so very shocking.

I do not rely on the Barrier Act. If I may say so, it seems to me that that was rather a false point. The Barrier Act may possibly imply—it certainly does not assert—Church Power as understood by the Evangelical party and the Free Church of Scotland. The Resolution of 1838 belongs to a different class of legislation. It is a Declaratory Act. It speaks in the plainest and clearest language. The Free Church Catechism shews that at the time of the Disruption it was understood to mean precisely what it says, and to assert the exclusive power of the Church founded on the Word of God over doctrine—that is, over her creeds, her confessions, her formularies, and her decrees. So the Act of 1838 declares. So the Free Church Catechism of 1845 teaches. The Act of 1838 therefore supplies what was wanting in Craigdallie v. Aikman[1] and the very thing which in Lord Eldon's view would have sufficed to turn the scale. Without ignoring both the Act of 1838 and the Free Church Catechism of 1845 it seems to me impossible to deny that provision for expansion and development—for that growth without which there can be no life—was part and parcel of the original trust under which the funds in question in the present case have been collected and set apart.

If the view which I have roughly indicated is correct, I think it is enough to dispose of this case in both its branches. But there are two points on which a great deal of argument was bestowed, and on which I should like to say a few words. There is the Establishment principle as it is called, and there are those higher mysteries which were dealt with boldly but reverently by the learned counsel who spoke second for the United Free Church.[1]

As regards the Establishment principle, I know that that very distinguished man to whom I have already referred, and who, after Dr Chalmers, was the leader of the Free Church, doubted to the last whether the principle of a national Establishment of religion was a principle at all.[2] He maintained that throughout the whole of the Church's history there was no event—that was the word he used—that proclaimed formally and directly that the principle of a national Establishment of religion was a vital principle which the Church was bound to maintain. Speaking for myself, I do not altogether take that view, though I agree with him in thinking that the Establishment principle sinks into absolute insignificance compared with the great principle of the independence and power of the Church and "the exclusive authority of Christ in His own house." I think it must be admitted that the Establishment principle, as it may be gathered from the somewhat obscure language of the Westminster Confession, was the generally received opinion in the Church. It was necessarily the received, though unexpressed, opinion of the Church before the Disruption. When the Disruption took place circumstances were altered, and then I think there was a diversity of opinion on the subject.

Lord Trayner says that it appears to him "difficult to hold that a mere opinion as to what some third person was bound to do, which he might neglect or refuse to do, and which the Church would not compel him to do, could in any way be an essential part of the constitution of the Church which held that opinion." Well, that was exactly Dr Candlish's opinion at the very time of the Disruption. I refer to his opinion, not as the opinion of a person authorised to speak on behalf of the Church, but as the opinion of a very leading man, whom many others would probably follow.

At the General Assembly held in Glasgow in the autumn of the year of Disruption, Dr Candlish, speaking about the Establishment principle, and pointing out that the refusal of the State to establish the Church on the only terms to which the Church could consent, left them a great degree of liberty as to the terms on which they should stand with other Churches, puts the case thus:—"Is the division and schism of the Christian Church to be kept up by a question as to the duty of another party over whom we have no control? Let it be that we maintain our different opinions as to the duty of the State to support the Church, and the duty of the Church to receive support from the State when it is given consistently with spiritual freedom, still, shall that question, which has become a mere theoretical question in the Church of Christ, and which so far as we can judge seems destined to be a mere theoretical question till the time when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of Our Lord and of His Christ—shall that question prevent cordial co-operation and harmony among ourselves, and our united action in defence of our common Protestantism against the common foe?"[3]

Macalister v. Young.

I have no doubt that the opinions which Dr Candlish expressed so eloquently at the time of the Disruption must have been held by many adherents of the Free Church. And as time went on, and the spendid voluntaryism of the Free Church on a basis and a scale never before understood or attempted, placed the Free Church on a level with the Established Church at home, and in a position certainly not inferior as regards missionary labours abroad, the natural tendency, I think, even among those who were disposed to regard the Establishment principle as a sacred principle (if any such there were) must have been in the direction of the conclusion that the Church of Scotland could exist not only without an Establishment, but even without the profession of the Establishment principle.

Speaking for myself, and with the utmost deference to the great majority from whom I have the misfortune to differ, I think this question about the Establishment principle is a very small question indeed, and that it occupied a great deal too much of the argument, to the exclusion of far weightier matters.

I cannot call the matters that were discussed by Mr Haldane small or insignificant. They are mysteries into which I do not think it is our province to intrude. And, indeed, I am not quite sure that at the conclusion of Mr Haldane's argument I had gained a clearer insight into these hidden things than I had before. At any rate, I am happy to think that it is not necessary to enter into such questions at all. If the Church has power to relax the stringency of the formulæ required from her ministers and office-bearers so as to avoid offence to the consciences of the most conscientious and to keep within her fold the most able and enlightened of her probationers, that is all that is required. That she has that power I cannot doubt. These formulæ were imposed by Parliament. If they owed their force and efficiency in the Established Church to Acts of Parliament, the Free Church has rejected the ordinances of men and the authority of Parliament and is free to regulate her own formulæ. If in the Established Church they owed their force wholly or in part to the antecedent recognition of the Church, the Free Church, as it seems to me, claiming to act, and recognised by her adherents as acting, in the character of a National Church, and proceeding regularly in accordance with her constitution, may do now what the Church did in the seventeenth century.

Owing to the vast importance of this case and the very able and learned arguments of counsel at the Bar, I have thought it right to state in my own language the reasons which have led me to the opinion I hold. Under ordinary circumstances I should have been content to express my concurrence in the opinions delivered by the learned Judges in Scotland, and specially in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Trayner.

It is impossible, in my opinion, to overrate the importance of the issue awaiting decision. I do not agree with the learned counsel for the appellants that the United Free Church is a changeling, a creature of a composite nature, with a double face and two voices. I think the Free Church has preserved her identity. I think she is entitled to as much respect—I had almost said as much veneration—as when she went forth, casting off for conscience sake the fetters and the advantages of State connection. I do not think she has forfeited any of her rights by receiving into her bosom a reformed and Presbyterian Church, one with her in faith, in baptism, and all essential points of doctrine. And for my part I should hesitate long before I could give my voice for a decision which will, I fear, compel, or at any rate direct, her to subordinate the Scriptures to the Westminster Confession of Faith.

Macalister v. Young.

LORD DAVEY.—The subject-matter of the action out of which this appeal has arisen is certain heritable and moveable property of great value, which is held by trustees, who are the first respondents, in trust for the Free Church of Scotland. That Church is a voluntary and unincorporated association of Christians united on the basis of agreement in certain religious tenets and principles of worship, discipline, and Church government. The pursuers and present appellants were in the year 1900, and claim to be still, members of the Free Church, and their complaint, so far as it is cognisable by a civil Court, is that their trustees, at the bidding of other members of the Free Church, but in breach of their trust, have applied, and threaten and intend to apply, the trust property to purposes which are alien to the purposes of the trust, and for the benefit of persons who have no title to call themselves members of the Church. In fact, the appellants say that they alone hold in their integrity the tenets and principles of the association for whose benefit the trust was founded.

The law on this subject is free from doubt. It has been settled by numerous decisions of the Courts both in Scotland and in England, and has been affirmed by judgments of this House. The case of Craigdallie v. Aikman[1] came twice before this House. In the second appeal Lord Eldon thus stated the principle on which the House proceeded:—"When this matter was formerly before the House we acted upon this principle, that if we could find out what were the religious principles of those who originally attended the chapel we should hold the building appropriated to the use of persons who adhere to the same religious principles." And after stating the result of the inquiries directed by the former judgment, Lord Eldon said,—"Supposing that there is a division of religious opinions in the persons at present wishing to enjoy this building, the question then would be which of them adhered to the opinions of those who had built the place of worship, and which of them differed from those opinions? Those who still adhered to their religious principles being more properly to be considered as the cestuis que trust of those who held this place of worship in trust than those who have departed altogether from the religious principles of those who founded this place, if I may so express it."

In an English case (Attorney-General v. Pearson[2]) decided in 1817, and therefore between the two appeals in the Craigdallie[3] case, Lord Eldon, referring to that case, expounded the principle acted on by the House more at large. "But if," he said, "on the other hand, it turns out (and I think that this point was settled in a case which lately came before the House of Lords by way of appeal out of Scotland) that the institution was established for the express purpose of such form of religious worship, or the teaching of such particular doctrines as the founder has thought most conformable to the principles of the Christian religion, I do not apprehend that it is in the power of individuals having the management of that institution at any time to alter the purpose for which it was founded, or to say to the remaining members—'We have changed our opinions, and you, who assemble in this place for the purpose of hearing the doctrines and joining in the worship prescribed by the founder, shall no longer enjoy the benefit he intended for you, unless you conform to the alteration which has taken place in our opinions.' In such a case, therefore, I apprehend—considering it as settled by the authority of that I have already referred to—that when a congregation become dissentient among themselves, the nature of the original institution must alone be looked to as the guide for the decision of the Court, and that to refer to any other criterion as to the sense of the existing majority would be to make a new institution, which is altogether beyond the reach and inconsistent with the duties and character of this Court."

I disclaim altogether any right in this or any other Civil Court of this realm to discuss the truth or reasonableness of any of the doctrines of this or any other religious association, or to say whether any of them are or are not based on a just interpretation of the language of Scripture, or whether the contradictions or antinomies between different statements of doctrine are or are not real or apparent only, or whether such contradictions do or do not proceed only from an imperfect and finite conception of a perfect and infinite Being, or any similar question. The more humble, but not useless, function of the Civil Court is to determine whether the trusts imposed upon property by the founders of the trust are being duly observed. I appreciate, and if I may properly say so, I sympathise with, the effort made by men of great intelligence and sound learning to escape from the fetters forged by an earlier generation. But sitting on appeal from a Court of law, I am not at liberty to take any such matter into consideration.

The question in each case is, what were the religious tenets and principles which formed the bond of union of the association for whose benefit the trust was created? I do not think that the Court has any test or touchstone by which it can pronounce that any tenet forming part of the body of doctrine professed by the association is not vital, essential, or fundamental, unless the parties have themselves declared it not to be so. The bond of union, however, may contain within itself a power in some recognised body to control, alter, or modify the tenets and principles at one time professed by the association. But the existence of such a power would have to be proved like any other tenet or principle of the association.

I do not propose to travel through the numerous documents which state the grounds of the great Disruption in 1843, and the principles held and professed by the founders of the Free Church. The result, in my opinion, is that the Free Church took with it the doctrine, government, and discipline of the Established Church, freed from the fetters and conditions imposed on that Church by its connection with the State. The Free Church adopted as its standards the Westminister Confession and the other subordinate standards of the Established Church. It also adopted the provisions of the Barrier Act, and any other provisions affecting the constitution of the Church or the powers of its General Assembly. In fact, the founders of the Free Church claimed that "in doctrine, polity, and discipline they truly represented the Church of their fathers," and that "it is her being free and not her being established that constitutes the real historical and hereditary identity of the Reformed National Church of Scotland."

There is, however, one document which should be more particularly referred to, viz., the protest put forth as their first act by the members of the General Assembly of the Established Church who withdrew from that Assembly on the historical 18th May 1843. This protest was ordered to be recorded by the several Presbyteries of the Free Church at the beginning of their Presbytery books as the ground and warrant of their proceedings, and it may fitly be called the charter of the Free Church. It is at once an apologia and an affirmance of the distinctive position taken up by the founders of the Church. In vindicating in vigorous terms their right and duty to separate from the Establishment—maintaining the Confession of Faith and other standards of the Church of Scotland as theretofore understood—they are careful to firmly assert the right and duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's Word.

It is a matter in dispute whether it was a tenet of the Established Church that it is the duty of the State to establish and endow a National Church. It has been said by learned Judges in the Court of Session (see Lord Meadowbank in Smith v. Galbraith[1]) that it was not required that the principle of a religious establishment in connection with and endowed by the State should be professed as an article of faith. It was pointed out that the article on the civil magistrate admits of other constructions, and that a civil ruler may perform the duty ascribed to him in that article in other ways than by establishment and endowment. But, however this may be, I think it is plain from their public utterances that the founders of the Free Church considered that the Establishment principle was part of the body of doctrine which they brought with them from the Established Church, and that they held and stated it in the clearest terms. It is impossible, in my opinion, to get rid of the explicit statement of the doctrine in the protest of 18th May 1843 by calling it "parenthetical," or a matter of opinion. The affirmance of the doctrine may be said to derive strength from the form of the sentence. For it shews that the authors of the protest regarded it as of so much importance that they go out of their way to state it, and thus define more clearly their position, and avoid the imputation that by separating from the Established Church they had become Voluntaries. Again, in the Act of 1846, "anent questions and formula," while disclaiming intolerant or persecuting principles, "the Church firmly maintains the same Scriptural principles as to the duties of nations and their rulers in reference to true religion and the Church of Christ for which she has hitherto contended." And (not to multiply evidence of what is not really disputed) in the address of Dr Chalmers, which was incorporated in a manifesto issued by direction of the General Assembly of May 1843, and entitled "The Affectionate Representation of the Free Church of Scotland," that eminent person expressed himself in language which I will not repeat, as it has been read by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

I cannot bring myself to doubt that a doctrine thus "firmly" asserted and maintained, and officially put forward, was a distinctive tenet of the Free Church of Scotland, and formed a link in the bond of union between the members of that association. The Lord Ordinary and the learned Judges in the Inner-House treated it as neither fundamental nor essential, and they seem to have regarded it as a pious opinion, held, indeed, by the founders of the Church, but destitute in the circumstances of any practical importance. I have already said that I have no means of testing the fundamental or essential character of the doctrine apart from the utterances of the parties themselves. They certainly were as far as possible from treating it as an open question, and that attitude was maintained for many years after the foundation of the Church. The doctrine of the independence of the Church under the Headship of Christ alone was the very foundation of their position, and was necessarily put forward by them as fundamental, but that is no proof that they did not regard other tenets also as essential or distinctive articles of belief.

The questions therefore in my opinion come to be whether it was a term in the compact or bond of union that the General Assembly should have power to alter or vary the doctrines of the Church, and what are the limits (if any) of such a power. I was impressed (as I believe all your Lordships were) by the powerful argument of the Dean of Faculty. If I understood the learned Dean correctly, he maintained that the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland had by its constitution an inherent power of plenary legislation over all matters ecclesiastical, including doctrine, subject only to the conditions imposed by the Act of Assembly called the Barrier Act. And he carried his argument so far as to maintain that the General Assembly of the Free Church, exercising the inherent powers of the Established Church, but freed from the fetters imposed by Acts of Parliament, might derogate from or even reject the Confession of Faith itself.

The freedom of the Church from the control of the civil power in spiritualibus, which is asserted by the Free Church, does not appear to me to warrant any a priori inference of the existence of such a plenary power of legislation in the General Assembly. It is, indeed, almost a truism that an unestablished religious association is free from State control as regards doctrine, government, and discipline. But that freedom which differentiates a voluntary association from an Established Church is not inconsistent with the adoption by the association of certain tenets which distinguish it from other similar bodies. The right of the Assembly to impose any innovation from established doctrine on a dissentient minority, and the limits of such right (if any), must be found in the constitutional powers of that body, and must be proved by evidence. The historical argument of the learned Dean appears to me on examination to afford but little assistance on this crucial point. Knox's Confession of Faith was not adopted by the General Assembly of the Church, for at that time the Presbyterian form of Church government was not established, and there was no such body. It was presented by the Barons and others to Parliament and then passed into law. The Statutes of 1638 and the subsequent years were passed during the period which is called in Scotch ecclesiastical history the Second Reformation, and appear to be in the nature of protests against the action of the King's Government, and in some instances the King's Commissioner is supplicated to obtain the ratification by Parliament of the Acts of the Assembly. The Westminster Confession was adopted by an Act of the General Assembly in 1647, and did not, it is true, receive Parliamentary sanction until 1692, after the period of disturbance between the Restoration and the Revolution of 1688 had passed away. It is to be observed, however, that in the Act of 1647, approving the Westminster Confession, it is expressly stated that the said Confession was found by the Assembly to be "in nothing contrary to the received doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of this Kirk." The Assembly therefore did not consider itself to be introducing into the Church any innovation in doctrine. The Westminster Confession was intended to be an eirenicon or basis of union between the Churches in the two kingdoms, and the adoption of it by the Scottish Assembly was as much a political as an ecclesiastical act. The "Chapels Act" and the "Veto Act," which were the forerunners and indirectly the cause of the great Disruption, can hardly be cited as evidence of the power of legislation which is claimed. These Acts were said by their authors to be declaratory only of existing rights, and although they involved the assertion of the larger principle for which the majority in the General Assembly were then contending, the particular subjects dealt with would seem to come within the scope of the internal management of an established Church. They were held in the Court of Session and in this House in the course of the litigation which ensued to be of no effect, because their provisions (it was held) were at variance with those of Acts of Parliament. It was not necessary, therefore, for the learned Judges to give any decision as to the abstract power in the General Assembly to pass them. But the dicta of the learned Judges were not favourable to the respondent's contention (see the opinions in the first Auchterarder case [1]).

Counsel referred to chap. vii. of the Second Book of Discipline. The sections numbered from 6 to 8 describe the powers of all assemblies from kirk-session to an Ecumenical Council, and do not relate specially to the General Assembly. It does not appear to me that any of these sections either confer or recognise the existence of a power in the General Assembly to impose new doctrines on the Church, for that is what is claimed. They seem to be directed to the preservation and maintenance of established doctrine and the reform of abuses. Sections 21 to 26 describe the powers of what is there called the National Assembly, corresponding to what is now designated the General Assembly. There are large powers for the protection of the spiritual jurisdiction, the patrimony of the Kirk, and generally concerning "all weighty affairs that concern the well-being and good order of the whole Kirks of the realm." But nothing is said as to doctrine. Counsel did not in fact bring to your Lordships' attention any work of recognised authority in the Presbyterian Churches in which it is clearly laid down that the General Assembly possesses this plenary power of legislation over doctrine. And I cannot say that it has been proved to my satisfaction that either by inherent right or by usage or by contract the General Assembly of the Free Church has any such power.

But I think that the learned Judges of the Court of Session relied principally on the provisions of the Barrier Act, 1697. The first observation is that that Act is a procedure Act, and not an enabling Act. It does not purport to confer any new powers whatever, but it regulates the exercise of such powers as the General Assembly may possess. It is said, however, that the provisions of the Barrier Act contemplate and imply the existence of a power in the General Assembly to make some innovations or alterations in (amongst other things) doctrine. I think this would be true if, after the word "existence," you added the words "or the possible exercise by the Assembly." The Act may have been passed for the purpose of preventing a majority from making or assenting to sudden innovations and alterations which it was expected or feared might be attempted from within or from without, without very carefully weighing what the strict constitutional powers of the Assembly were. But, let it be assumed that the language of the Act does imply the existence of some power. Certainly it is not necessarily an unlimited or general power, and the question then is, what is the extent or what are the limits of the power? It has been said that it is a power to legislate in any manner not inconsistent with the continued existence of the Church. But applying that to the case now before us what, it may be asked, is the Church but an organised association of Christians holding certain doctrines and principles in common? I was at one time disposed to think that a sound limitation might be found if the power were confined to the interpretation of formularies. But further reflection has satisfied me that if your Lordships were so to hold, you would only be making a more or less plausible but wholly unverified assumption. I also think that not only an accepted interpretation of Scripture, but an accepted interpretation of or inference from a subordinate standard may just as well be an article of faith as any other opinion, and there is no tenable distinction for this purpose between one religious principle or opinion and another. I do not think, for example, that you advance the argument by calling the Establishment principle a question of policy only. I have come to the conclusion that it would be contrary to all principle to infer from the provisions of the Barrier Act, unsupported by any evidence of usage or other evidence, a power in the General Assembly, or the majority, to vary the trusts upon which this property is held to the prejudice of a dissentient minority. I think the Dean of Faculty was logically right in contending for an unrestricted power of legislation. But if the property was intended to be held in trust for a body of Christians holding such doctrines as the majority acting through the General Assembly might from time to time approve, such an intention should be made clear beyond the possibility of question.

Now, what is it that the General Assembly has done? I shall content myself by referring to three documents. In 1867 there was a movement in the Free Church for union with the United Presbyterian Church. In a report of a committee of the Free Church of that year on union with other Churches there is contained a statement of the United Presbyterian Church Committee under the heading of "Distinctive Articles":—"That it is not competent to the civil magistrate to give legislative sanction to any creed in the way of setting up a civil Establishment of religion, nor is it within his province to provide for the expense of the administration of religion out of the national resources; that Jesus Christ, as sole King and Head of His Church, has enjoined upon His people to provide for maintaining and extending it by freewill offerings; that this being the ordinance of Christ it excludes State aid for these purposes, and that adherence to it is the true safeguard of the Church's independence. Moreover, though uniformity of opinion with respect to civil Establishments of religion is not a term of communion in the United Presbyterian Church, yet the views on this subject held, and universally acted on, are opposed to these institutions." I will only ask your Lordships to contrast this language with the views on this subject expressed by Dr Chalmers, and put forward by the founders of the Free Church in their manifesto entitled "The Affectionate Representation of the Free Church of Scotland, 1843," to which I have already referred. In fact the voluntary principle—i.e., the unlawfulness of accepting aid in any form from the State—was put forward as one of the most distinctive principles of the United Presbyterian Church in a tract published by authority on the jubilee of that Church in the year 1897.

By an Act of the General Assembly of the Free Church dated October 30, 1900, after a recital that a union of the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland was in contemplation, and was about to be consummated, it was enacted and ordered (amongst other things) that all property held by trustees for behoof of the Free Church of Scotland should belong to and be held for behoof of the United Free Church of Scotland.

On the following day the Act of Union was passed, and certain declarations were adopted by the United Assembly defining the basis of union, the third of which is as follows:—

"As this union takes place on the footing of maintaining the liberty of judgment and action heretofore recognised in either of the Churches uniting, so in particular it is hereby declared that members of both Churches and also of all Churches which in time past have united with either of them, shall have full right as they see cause to assert and maintain the views of truth and duty which they had liberty to maintain in the said Churches."

In other words, the Establishment principle and the doctrine as to the duty of the civil magistrate towards the Church which was maintained and firmly held by the founders of the Free Church are henceforth to be open questions for members, ministers, and office-bearers, and the property which was placed in trust for the Free Church is henceforth to be held in trust for the maintenance of a Church, in the pulpits of which distinctive tenets of the Free Church may or may not be taught, and, indeed, doctrines at variance with them, and directly contradictory of the Establishment principle, may lawfully be maintained. The appellants also say that in the constitution of the United Free Church another distinctive principle of the Free Church as declared by the founders of that Church has been abrogated, namely, the unqualified acceptance of the Westminster Confession. They point to the change in the language of the question relating to the Confession which candidates are required to answer in the United Free Church. They say that this change, accompanied and explained by the declaration contained in the preamble of the Act prescribing these questions, has the effect of substituting for a belief in the whole doctrine of the Confession of Faith belief in such portions thereof only as the General Assembly may from time to time determine to be of the substance of the Reformed Faith, or (in other words) such portions as the Assembly may from time to time approve. This is not a mere question of interpretation of formularies, and I am disposed to think that on this point also the argument of the appellants is well founded. The learned Dean of Faculty rightly said that the substantial question was, whether the United Free Church had preserved its identity with and is the legitimate successor of the Free Church. I find myself quite unable to answer that question in the affirmative.

The other case relates to the trusts of buildings held for particular Free Church congregations on trust-deeds which are in the form of the Model Trust Deed approved by the General Assembly of the Free Church. The terms of this trust-deed were much relied on by the counsel for the respondents not only with reference to these congregational trusts, but also on the general question. The trust is that the building shall be enjoyed as a place of religious worship by a congregation of the said body of Christians called the Free Church of Scotland, or of any united body of Christians composed of them, and of such body or bodies of Christians as the Free Church may at any time hereafter associate with themselves under the aforesaid name of the Free Church of Scotland, or under whatever name or designation they may assume. The operative part of the deed is preceded by a long historical narrative, which is interesting and appears to me rightly to define the position and constitution of the Free Church, but it does not appear to me to carry the case further than the facts themselves do. Nor do the terms of the trust seem to affect the general question beyond shewing that it was in the contemplation of the parties that the Free Church might unite with some bodies of Christians. With regard to the congregational property, I feel more difficulty. I think the soundest view, however, is to hold that there is a general overriding trust for the purposes of the Free Church, and it was not intended that the majority controlling the Free Church might by subverting the basis of that Church divert the trusts of the congregational property. I think, therefore, that the union here contemplated must be taken to be one with other Churches which might properly be made without detriment to the distinctive tenets of the Free Church. More than one union of that character has in fact been made without objection.

For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that the two appeals should be allowed.

LORD JAMES.—In the cases before your Lordships for decision the secular Courts have been appealed to for the purpose of determining differences that have arisen between two sections of the Church until lately known as the Free Church of Scotland.

The jurisdiction of the Courts, and therefore of your Lordships, to determine such differences proceeds from the fact that property held by trustees upon certain trusts has lately been dealt with, or sought to be dealt with, for the purpose of carrying out a union between the Free Church of Scotland and another body, known as the United Presbyterian Church; and the pursuers in the Court below—the appellants before your Lordships—allege that the application of the properties in question to the purposes of the Churches thus united constitutes a breach of the trusts under which the properties are held.

It is obvious that the first step towards the elucidation of the question before your Lordships' House is to determine the nature of the trusts controlling the properties in question. In order to do so a brief reference to facts, some of which have become historical, is necessary.

Prior to 1843 the Presbyterian Church of Scotland was in existence as the Established Church. But grave questions deeply affecting the minds and opinions of some of its members had come into existence. The Protest of the General Assembly of the Free Church, dated May 18, 1843, complains, —"That the Courts of the Church, by law established, and the members thereof, are liable to be coerced by the Civil Courts in the exercise of their spiritual functions and, in particular, in the admission to the office of the holy ministry and the constitution of the pastoral relation, and that they are subject to be compelled to intrude ministers on reclaiming congregations in opposition to the fundamental principles of the Church and their views of the Word of God—and to the liberties of Christ's people."

On this ground, and apparently on this ground only, a large number of the members of the Established Church seceded from it and formed themselves into a new body, under the name of the Free Church. As far as I know, the seceding body adhered to all the tenets and views of the Establishment, excepting upon the above question of secular interference with the spiritual affairs of the Church.

Upon the Free Church thus constituted as a whole, and upon certain congregations of it, considerable property has been conferred by different settlors and donors.

The case set up by the pursuers is, that these properties are held under certain trusts; that those who conferred the properties upon the Free Church intended that they should be applied for the purposes of that Church as it existed at the time when the transfers of property were made. It is also alleged that the Free Church, having united with another body known as the United Presbyterian Church, has so varied its conditions as to cease to retain its original identity. In the Courts below reliance in support of this contention was almost entirely placed upon the argument that a fundamental difference existed between the two Churches in this: that the Free Church acknowledged and asserted the principle of an Established Church, whilst the United Presbyterian Church condemned that principle, and was, to the fullest extent, a voluntary Church, accepting Voluntaryism as a necessary and fundamental article of its faith.

Such being the case presented in the Courts below and at the bar of your Lordships' House by the pursuers, it is necessary first to determine to what extent the Free Church was based upon the principles of Establishment. But before entering upon such inquiry it is, I think, worthy of remark that the Church is not a positive defined entity as would be the case if it were a corporation created by law. It is a body of men united only by the possession of common opinions, and if this community of opinion ceases to exist, the foundations of the Church give way. But difference of opinion to produce this result must be in respect of fundamental principles, and not of minor matters of administration or of faith.

The basis of the Established Presbyterian Church was the Westminster Confession of Faith. At the time of the Disruption in 1843 full adhesion to the principles of this important document was declared by the seceders. Article III. of Chapter XIII. of the Westminster Confession is as follows: —"The civil magistrate may not assume to himself the administration of the Word and Sacraments or of the power of the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven; yet he hath authority and it is his duty to take order that unity and peace be preserved in the Church, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered, and observed. For the better effecting whereof he hath power to call Synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."

It seems to me that this Article clearly enunciates the principle of an Establishment, and that this principle, as distinguished from its application, has never been repudiated by those who formed the Free Church.

But the opinion of anyone on that point at the present day is of but little importance compared with the views expressed by those who formed that Church. Clear and distinct expression of those views can be found.

In the first place, in the Claim, Declaration, and Protest issued by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland on May 30, 1842, it is stated,[1] —"Whereas it is an essential doctrine of this Church and a fundamental principle in its constitution as set forth in the Confession of Faith thereof in accordance with the Word and Law of the Most Holy God, that there is no other Head of the Church but the Lord Jesus Christ (Chapter XXV., s. 6), and that while God, the supreme Lord and King of all the world, has ordained civil magistrates to be under Him over the people for His own glory and the public good, and to this end hath armed them with the power of the sword (Chapter XXIII., s. 1), and while it is the duty of people to pray for magistrates, to honour their persons, to pay them tribute and other dues, to obey their lawful commands, and to be subject to their authority for conscience' sake, from which ecclesiastical persons are not exempted (Chapter XXIII., s. 4), and while the magistrate hath authority, and it is his duty in the exercise of that power, which alone is committed to him, namely, 'the power of the sword' or civil rule, as distinct from the 'power of the Keys,' or spiritual authority expressly denied to him, to take order for the preservation of purity, peace, and unity in the Church, yet, 'The Lord Jesus as King and Head of His Church hath therein appointed a government in the hand of Church officers distinct from the civil magistrate (Chapter XXX., s. 1), which government is ministerial, not lordly, and to be exercised in consonance with the laws of Christ and with the liberties of His people.'"

[1] See Appx. G., L. R. [1904], p. 737.

And again in the same document there appears as follows:—"And whereas the Church highly valuing as she has ever done her connection on the terms contained in the statutes hereinbefore recited with the State, and her possession of the temporal benefits thereby secured to her for the advantage of the people, must nevertheless, even at the risk and hazard of the loss of that connection and of these public benefits—deeply as she would deplore and deprecate such a result for herself and the nation—persevere in maintaining her liberties as a Church of Christ."

Coming to the Protest of May 1843, we read:—"And finally while firmly asserting the right and duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's Word, and reserving to ourselves and successors to strive by all lawful means as opportunity shall, in God's good providence, be offered to secure the performance of this duty according to the Scriptures." Yet the document proceeds to announce separation.

Again, in the Pastoral Address issued by the General Assembly of the Free Church on the same day, May 30, 1843, it is stated,—"Long was it the peculiar distinction and high glory of the Established Church of Scotland to maintain the sole Headship of the Lord Jesus Christ, His exclusive Headship in the Church which is His Kingdom and House. It was ever held by her indeed that the Church and the State being equally ordinances of God, and having certain objects connected with His glory and the social welfare, might and ought to unite in a joint acknowledgment of Christ and on the employment of the means and reasons belonging to them respectively for the advancement of His cause. But while the Church in this manner might lend her services to the State, and the State give its support to the Church, it was ever held as a fundamental principle that each still remained, and ought under all circumstances to remain, supreme in its own sphere, and independent of the other. On the one hand, the Church having received her powers of internal spiritual government directly from her Divine Head, it was held that she must herself at all times exercise the whole of it, under a sacred and inviolable responsibility to Him alone, so as to have no power to fetter herself, by a connection with the State or otherwise, in the exercise of her spiritual functions. And in like manner, in regard to the State, the same was held to be true, on the same grounds, and to the very same extent in reference to its secular sovereignty. It was maintained that as the spiritual liberties of the Church, bequeathed to her by her Divine Head, were entirely beyond the control of the State, so, upon the other hand, the State held directly and exclusively from God, and was entitled and bound to exercise, under its responsibility to Him alone, its entire secular sovereignty, including therein whatever it was competent for, or binding upon, the State to do about sacred things, or in relation to the Church, as, for example, endowing and establishing the Church, and fixing the terms and conditions of that Establishment."

But perhaps the most explicit declaration on the subject of the principle of Establishment is to be found in the following words of Dr Chalmers, rendered authoritative by their circulation by the orders of the General Assembly of May 1843: "The Voluntaries mistake us if they conceive us to be Voluntaries." (These are the words which were read by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.) "We hold by the duty of government to give of their resources and their means for the maintenance of a Gospel ministry in the land; and we pray that their eyes may be opened, so as that they may yet learn how to acquit themselves as the protectors of the Church, and not as its corrupters or its tyrants. We pray that the sin of Uzziah, into which they have fallen, may be forgiven them; and that those days of light and blessedness may speedily arrive, when kings shall be the nursing fathers, and queens the nursing mothers of our Zion. In a word, we hold that every part and every function of a commonwealth should be leavened with Christianity; and that every functionary, from the highest to the lowest, should, in their respective spheres, do all that lies in them to countenance and uphold it. That is to say, though we quit the Establishment, we go out on the Establishment principle—we quit a vitiated Establishment, but would rejoice in returning to a pure one. To express it otherwise, we are the advocates for a national recognition and a national support of religion, and we are not Voluntaries."

To these declarations of Dr Chalmers I feel great importance should be attached. Apart from the fact that they were issued under the authority of the General Assembly, Dr Chalmers was specially appealing for material support for the Free Church as a seceding body; and I know nothing more likely to influence the generosity of donors than the eloquent appeal of such a man as Dr Chalmers. From him those who gave would seek both guidance and information as to the body upon which their gifts would be conferred.

Then in December 1843, the Assembly of the Free Church, replying to the address from the Congregational Churches of North Wales, said: "But you misapprehend the nature of the movement we have made in supposing that we have in the least degree altered our views respecting the lawfulness and desirableness of a right connection between Church and State."

That the Establishment principle was adhered to by the Free Church seems to have been accepted in the Court below. Lord Trayner in his judgment says: "It is not open to doubt that the Free Church from its constitution in 1843 down, at least, to its union with the United Presbyterian Church professed the Establishment principle."

Even the separation from the Established Church was apparently intended to be of a temporary character only, because we find in the Claim and Protest of 30th May 1842, the following statement: "But that it shall be free to the members of this Church or their successors at any time hereafter when there shall be a chance of obtaining justice to claim the restitution of all such civil rights and privileges and temporal benefits and endowments as for the present they may be compelled to yield up in order to procure to their office-bearers the best exercise of their spiritual government and discipline and to their people the liberties of which respectively it has been attempted so contrary to law and justice to deprive them."

Such being the declarations of the seceders at the time of the Disruption, I can find no departure from such views at any time before the union with the United Presbyterian Church. On the contrary, between the years 1842 and 1900 repeated declarations of adhesion to the principle of Establishment were made on behalf of the Free Church.

No. 1.

Aug. 1, 1904.
Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun.
Macalister v. Young.

I have thus dealt at length with the position accepted by the Free Church in relation to Establishment, and the result seems to be that the seceders of 1843, having belonged to the Established Church, seceded from it, not because it was an Established Church, but because the principle of the Establishment within it had become vitiated. To the principles of Establishment the seceders still fully adhered; and to the Established Church itself they would gladly have returned as soon as there was any discontinuance of the interference with spiritual government which they regarded as vitiating the true principles of Establishment.

It still has to be considered whether the principle was essential and fundamental or a mere matter of policy. It is difficult to define any positive standard between an essential and a non-essential principle. But surely there is a great gulf between the principle of Establishment and that of Voluntaryism. It seems to me, having read the declarations of the General Assembly and the distinct utterances of Dr Chalmers, that scant justice would be done to the eloquent leaders of the secession movement of 1843 if we construed them as treating the Establishment principle as being non-essential or unimportant.

Still more important is it to consider what was the view of the importance of the principle entertained by those donors who, may be, listened to the appeal of Dr Chalmers. Would they have regarded it as non-essential? Would they have endowed a Church pledged to Voluntaryism? I think not.

It is a much easier task to gather the views of the United Presbyterian Church on the subject of Establishment. That Church came into existence in the year 1847 by virtue of the union of two Churches which had previously seceded from the Established Church. It is not denied that from first to last the United Presbyterian Church has existed without connection with the State, and as a voluntary Church accepting as a fundamental principle that of Voluntaryism. A most emphatic declaration in favour of that principle was made as late as the year 1897 in a tract, No. XXV., issued by the United Presbyterian Church. Again I quote Lord Trayner's authority in the Court below. He says that it is not open to doubt "that the United Presbyterian Church throughout the whole period of its existence has repudiated the principle of Establishment and professed instead the principle of Voluntaryism."

Entertaining these different views, the Free Church and the United Presbyterians have taken steps, seemingly correct in form, to become united under the name of the United Free Church. And this union is sought by the majority who support it to be imposed on the minority who object to become members of the new United Church, and to take effect upon property held by the Free Church so as to transfer it to the new body, the United Church.

Apparently it was sought to make the union subject to a reservation, so as to leave an independent and different judgment to members of the two Churches. Clause 3 of the declaration of the United Assembly is as follows:—"As this union takes place on the footing of maintaining the liberty of judgment and action heretofore recognised in either of the Churches uniting, so in particular it is hereby declared that members of both Churches, and also of all Churches which in time past have united with either of them, shall have full right, as they see cause, to assert and maintain the views of truth and duty which they had liberty to maintain in the said Churches."

No. 1.

Macalister v. Young.

But this freedom to differ, whilst admitting the differences, does not lessen or remove them. The United Free Church, as a whole, holds within it neither the principle of Establishment nor of Voluntaryism; such questions were to be open questions. But the man who as a member of the Free Church had accepted the views of a Church which claimed Establishment as one of its fundamental principles may well object when he is told that he shall no longer belong to a Church holding that principle, but that he must, under compulsion, join a Church wherein members of it may think as they will on this broad subject, and must, whether he wishes it or not, be in communion with the supporters of the voluntary system to the same extent as if they had been adherents to the principle of Establishment in accordance with the tenets of the Free Church.

We must recollect that we are dealing with property applied to the use of men in return for services rendered as ministers of the Free Church—to the use of men who have adhered to the tenets of that Church—who have changed nothing, who have varied nothing. From an answer I received from counsel at the bar I learnt that the refusal of these ministers to become members of this mixed body was treated as a matter of discipline, and so the sentence for thus adhering to an old unaltered faith apparently amounts to deprivation.

That this is so seems to proceed from the effect of the Act of 30th October 1900, whereby it was resolved that the whole property of the Free Church should be transferred to and belong to the United Free Church. The assertion that the dissenting minority by so dissenting ceased to be members of the Free Church, and lost and forfeited all their rights and privileges as members thereof, is to be found at statement 15 of the defenders' case. The sentence thus imposed upon the ministers who adhered to their old opinions is somewhat draconic: "They separated and cut themselves off from the said Church," says the statement of the defenders, "and by so doing lost and forfeited all their rights and privileges as members thereof. They do not constitute or represent the Free Church of Scotland, and they have no right or title to any property which belonged to the said Free Church of Scotland. They are not members of the United Free Church of Scotland, and they have no right or title to any property belonging to it."

There are one or two subjects that must be referred to. Lord Trayner in his judgment says,—"But esto that the Establishment principle had been explicitly declared in 1843 to be an essential principle of the Free Church, I think the Church had the power to abandon that principle, and to that extent alter that principle." From this view I differ, because, regarding "essential" as meaning fundamental, I do not think that a Church can change such fundamental principle and yet at the same time preserve its identity. As I understood, it was admitted at the bar this power of change is restricted so as to keep the Church within the limits of identity. The retention of the name does not preserve identity, and yet the change of principles might be so great as to leave nothing but the name of the Church. I think, too, it was admitted by way of example that if change had introduced the doctrines of the Church of Rome the identity of the Free Church would be lost, and surely this view brings us back to the question whether there has been any change of a fundamental or vital principle of the Church, and to this an answer has been given.

An important document, the Model Trust Deed of November 1844 has also to be dealt with. The respondents naturally rely upon it as shewing that at the very time of the secession it was contemplated that the Free Church might unite with other Churches. I agree that this is so, for the deed sets out a trust in favour of the congregations "of the said body of Christians called the Free Church of Scotland, or of any united body of Christians composed of them, and of such other body or bodies of Christians as the said Free Church may at any time hereafter associate with themselves."

Even if the Model Trust Deed contained no such reference to union with other Churches I should regard the power as existing, for I agree with Lord Young when he says in his judgment that "any two or more Churches may lawfully unite so as to form one Church, and that nothing more is necessary to the union than their own consent, which they are respectively free to give or withhold."

Doubtless that is so in respect of the mere legality of the act of uniting, but different considerations are raised in these suits. We have to deal with the rights of property, with the execution of trusts, and we have to see that the objects the donors had in view are carried out. Such being the case, I do not think that the Model Trust Deed gives greater power of union than the Free Church possessed without it. The Church may unite, and so says the Model Trust Deed, but if property is sought to be transferred to the new body the identity of that new body—that is the Free Church—after the union must be maintained; and nothing in the deed gives a power to unite so as to bring into existence a Church incapable of identity with the Free Church. And if this be so, we are recalled to the consideration of the main question argued in this case.

Great stress was laid at the bar upon the effect of an Act passed in the year 1697 called the Barrier Act.[1] It was argued that this Act conferred legislative powers upon the General Assembly in respect of matters of doctrine or worship, discipline, or government within the Church. I cannot agree in this view. The Act is entitled "An Act anent the method of passing Acts of Assembly of general concern to the Church, and for preventing of innovations." It is a procedure Act regulating the exercise of the existing powers of the Assembly, but conferring no new jurisdiction and increasing no powers. Doubtless the Assembly had before the passing of the Acts certain powers in respect of the matters referred to, and it was thought desirable to enact that such powers should only be exercised after full notice given. That is all the Barrier Act did. Certainly nothing within it gives any power to alter the identity of the Church.

I have not thought it necessary to enter upon any detailed statement of the law affecting the application of property left in trust for a voluntary body such as the Free Church was. It seems enough to say that sufficient guidance on that subject is to be found in the case of Craigdallie v. Aikman,[1] the decision in which case supplies principles applicable to the present.

I probably have already conveyed to your Lordships the result I have arrived at. After very earnest consideration of the facts before this House, and of the very able arguments presented at the bar, I have come to the conclusion that the appellants are entitled to the judgment of your Lordships. That conclusion is founded upon the grounds I have above referred to. I am thus relieved from dealing with the second ground upon which the union of the Churches is attacked, and I am glad that there is no necessity for me to deal with that interesting but difficult problem presented by the alleged difference of doctrine existing in the two Churches.

I am aware that your Lordships' duty is only to give judgment upon the strict issues raised before you, and that that judgment must lie where it falls; but, even at the risk of exceeding my duty, I venture to express the sincere hope that some way will be found to avoid the capture by either litigants of any spoils of war; and that hope is confident, because I believe that the primary, indeed the only, object of those who have united and those who have dissented has been to promote the interests of the Church, and that equally now will it be their care that the Church as a whole, and the individual members of it, shall in no degree suffer from the events with which your Lordships have had to deal.

Lord Robertson.—In the elaborate arguments submitted to the House many questions have been discussed which involve difficult theological and historical inquiries. I have, as in duty bound, carefully considered those various aspects of the controversy, and I have come to the conclusion that the case admits of decision, and ought to be decided, upon grounds much more palpable and certain.

The question is, to whom does certain property now belong which was given to the denomination of Christians which called itself the Free Church of Scotland? That body was founded in 1843; it consisted of ministers and laity who seceded from the Established Church of Scotland on certain questions of Church polity, but who professed to carry with them all the doctrine and system of the Established Church, only freeing themselves, by secession, from what they regarded as intolerable encroachments by the Law Courts upon the Church's spiritual functions. Rightly or wrongly, the theory of the Free Church was that they, and not the Established Church, were the Church of Scotland.

The Church thus set up was endowed, by the liberality of its members, with the property now in dispute. Two competitors now claim it. Of the respondents, the first remark to be made goes to the very root of their claim. They are not, either in name or composition, the Free Church of Scotland. They are not even the majority of the Free Church, but the assignees of the majority of the Free Church; they are a body formed in 1900 by the fusion of the majority of the Free Church with another body of Presbyterian Dissenters, the United Presbyterian Church. The property of the Free Church is claimed by this composite body, which, to the extent of a third or some large proportion (for the particulars are not before us and are unimportant), is composed of United Presbyterians. Of this new body it may be affirmed nearly as truly that it is United Presbyterian as that it is Free Church, and its name, the "United Free Church," suggests the fact.

Now I do not attach conclusive importance to the name; but it is important and still more significant. In any view, the change of name and the fact of fusion put it on the respondents to prove their identity with the original beneficiaries. They have to do this, too, not in a question with the heirs-at-law of the founders, but in competition with an existing body of ministers and members of the original Free Church, who have simply stayed where they were, and about whose pedigree there is no dubiety.

For reasons to be afterwards stated, it is not too lightly to be assumed that such unions are within the competency of any majority, however large, even if there existed no essential differences between the uniting bodies. The present, however, is not a case in which (as in some instances, which will presently be examined in detail) the Free Church has absorbed smaller Presbyterian bodies holding all her own pristine principles, and has done so without any change of her name or formularies. The United Presbyterian Church treated with and joined the Free Church not only formally, but in fact, on at least equal terms. The two bodies which met to consummate the union enacted and declared that the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church "do and shall henceforth constitute one united Church, that the name of the united Church shall be the United Free Church of Scotland, and that its supreme Court shall be designated the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland." From these proceedings it resulted that, so far as the respondents were concerned, the Free Church judicatories ceased to exist, their place being taken by Kirk-Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assemblies of the new Church, composed in part of gentlemen who formerly were United Presbyterians, and in part of gentlemen who formerly were Free Churchmen.

On 30th October 1900, the General Assembly of the Free Church made over the whole property of the Free Church to the United Free Church. On the following day, 31st October 1900, the General Assembly of the new Church proceeded to set up a new formulary for the admission of their preachers, which had been preconcerted and made matter of treaty. Whereas a probationer of the Free Church used to be required to affirm his belief that "The whole doctrine of 'the Confession of Faith' is the truths of God," the United Free Church probationer requires to affirm his belief in "the doctrine of this Church" (i.e., the United Free Church), "set forth in the Confession of Faith." (The elasticity of "the doctrine of the United Free Church," which is thus made the object of belief, is ascertained by the fact that the various matters of agreement between the Churches with a view to union were declared by the United Assembly to be "accepted and enacted without prejudice to the inherent liberty of the United Church as a Church of Christ to determine and regulate its own constitution and laws as duty may require in dependence on the grace of God and under the guidance of His Holy Word.") The United Free Church probationer has also to affirm the general principles of the (United Presbyterian) "Basis of Union, 1847," as well as those of the (Free Church) "Claim of Right of 1842," to be principles sanctioned by the Word of God and the subordinate standards of the Church. I do not at present comment on the importance of such changes, but note them as shewing that the constitution of the new Church is a new constitution enacted by the new and composite body, and adapted to the exigencies of the United Presbyterians.

Another matter of salient importance demands attention. One of the recitals in the Act of General Assembly of the Free Church by which they authorised the union is that, "the committees of the two Churches having met and communicated to one another the existing doctrinal standards, rules, and methods of the two Churches, it appeared that in regard to doctrine, government, discipline, and worship therein set forth a remarkable and happy agreement obtained between them, and also in particular in the views of the two Churches in respect to the spirituality and freedom of the Church of Christ—her subjection to Him as her only Head and to His Word as her supreme standard, and that an incorporating union might harmoniously be accomplished." There is no profession of identity, but of an "agreement" having been "obtained," which is described as "remarkable." Now the steps and stages of these long negotiations are before the House, and from these it appears that on this question of Establishment there were in 1863 and in 1867 sharp differences. The tenets of the two bodies are printed in parallel columns in the printed papers, and I am going shortly to refer to them.

Nothing before the House shews or suggests that the United Presbyterians departed by an iota from their own doctrine. On the other hand, there is no avowal by the Free Church that she departed from the position formulated in the parallel columns. What was done was simply to drop the subject and unite.

While such is the name and such the composition of the respondents' body, the position of the other competitor, the appellants, is very much simpler. They are those ministers and laity of the Free Church who did not concur in the union of 1900, but protested against it; they have done nothing but remain where they were, holding to the letter all the doctrines of the Free Church, adhering to it as an institute, and continuing its existence according to the measure of their powers. They say that in the event which has happened they are the Free Church—their brethren having left them for this new Church—just as those brethren might have left them for the Establishment or for the Episcopalians. They have, however, been declared by the respondents no longer to be of their communion, and their manses and churches have been formally claimed by the respondents for their own exclusive use. The adherents of the appellants are numerically few—some few thousands—but it has not been suggested that this introduces any legal difference from the situation as it would have been had they been more numerous. Since the days of Cyrus it has been held that justice is done by giving people, not what fits them, but what belongs to them.

Such being, in sketch, the relative positions of the two claimants to this property, it is plain that the respondents can only succeed by making out that it was an inherent quality of that Free Church to which this property was given that it could transform itself in the way that I have described, and oust from the property those who desire to remain where they were, in principle, doctrine, and organisation. For let it not be forgotten that the contention of the respondents necessarily involves that the majority is entitled, not merely themselves to retain the property, but (1) to introduce the United Presbyterians as beneficiaries, and (2) to oust the dissentient minority from the benefits of the foundation. This is why I protested at the outset against the too ready acceptance of the doctrine that "union" is competent to a majority.

In considering this contention, I steady myself by dwelling on an observation very frequently repeated by the Dean of Faculty in his able speech for the respondents. "This case," said the Dean, "differs from all previous cases in the same region of law in this—this is a gift to a Church," not to a congregation, nor for the promotion of certain doctrines, but to a Church named and designated. I think there is great force in this, but in another way from that intended. This property was given to the Free Church, an existing Church, complete within itself as an ecclesiastical organism and separate from other Churches. This becomes extremely clear when it is remembered that there were already existing, at the moment of the Disruption, the two dissenting Presbyterian bodies which now form this very United Presbyterian Church, and that the incorporation of those two into the United Presbyterian Church took place in 1847, during those early years of the Free Church when this property was being accumulated. Those dissenting bodies were, so far as worship, doctrine, discipline, and government were disclosed in their standards, exactly the same as the Free Church which was set up side by side with them. Accordingly, even if we knew nothing to corroborate the inference which this gives rise to, the broad fact is that the Free Church was set up as an independent Church separate from those with whom the recent union has now been effected. Therefore, with the Dean of Faculty, I say this property was given to a particular Church, and it is very difficult to see that it will do to end that Church, and then, picking up most of her doctrines, come forward to claim that United Presbyterian and Free Church alike shall share as members of a body which is not even called the Free Church.

When the history of the foundation of the Free Church is more closely examined, we see that it was not fortuitously or from mere love of separation that the Free Church was founded and endowed as a Church separate from the two confluents of the United Presbyterian Church.

Those existing dissenting bodies held opinions about Church government and Church and State which were inherited and carried forward by the United Presbyterian Church; and in 1843 they, as after 1847 their successor the United Presbyterian Church, were the exponents in Scotland of voluntary principles. By this, as it ought to be unnecessary to say, I mean, not merely that in fact they were not endowed by the State, but that they were opposed on principle to the endowment of religion by the State. It is honourable to the United Presbyterian Church that, in good times and in bad, it has never used ambiguous language or nicely balanced phrases about this matter, and has never sailed under false colours. All through the negotiations with the Free Church, as before them, it was strenuous and busy in "diffusing a knowledge of the voluntary principles of the Church"; it year by year upheld "the Church's testimony on the proper relations of Church and State, and in favour of religious equality by disestablishment and disendowment," and "renewed the testimony of 1847, constantly maintained 'That it is not within the province of civil government to provide for the religious instruction of the subject.'"

In order, once for all, to ascertain precisely the true position of the United Presbyterian Church upon these subjects, it is convenient to read the statement of their distinctive principles made by their committee when negotiating for union with the Free Church in 1867; and the passage has a special value, because, in the circumstances, it was not likely to contain overstatements on controversial points. It stands out also as a landmark, because it has never to this day been abandoned by the United Presbyterian Church, either before, in, or after their union with the Free Church. Here is what is said: "That it is not competent to the civil magistrate to give legislative sanction to any creed in the way of setting up a civil establishment of religion, nor is it within his province to provide for the expense of the ministrations of religion out of the national resources; that Jesus Christ, as sole King and Head of His Church, has enjoined upon His people to provide for maintaining and extending it by free-will offerings; that this being the ordinance of Christ, it excludes State aid for these purposes, and that adherence to it is the true safeguard of the Church's independence. Moreover, though uniformity of opinion with respect to civil establishments of religion is not a term of communion in the United Presbyterian Church, yet the views on this subject held and universally acted upon are opposed to these constitutions."

All of this declaration is very clear, but the closing sentence has a special significance in regard to the whole of the present case. On paper, the United Presbyterian Church held just the same general doctrines as the other Presbyterian Churches; like them, she held the Scriptures to be the only rule of faith; as with them, so with her, the Westminster Confession and Catechisms were her Confession and Catechism. None of her formularies made mention of Voluntaryism or exacted the profession of that principle from her office-bearers or members. The learned Judges whose decision is now under review would, I suppose, have thought that this fact removed all ground of division between the voluntary bodies and the Free Church bodies in 1843. But the founders of the Free Church were not content with these criteria of the distinctive notes or testimonies of a Church, and they declined to coalesce with the Voluntaries, although Voluntaryism was not then, any more than now, a term of communion in those bodies. "The Affectionate Representation of the Free Church of Scotland, 1843," is conclusive on this point, and it has a peculiarly direct authority and relevance in the present controversy. It has been called, and I think accurately, "the prospectus" of the new Church, and it states the grounds and principles on which support was asked for it. Now, this manifesto or prospectus discusses this very question of the proper relations of the Free Church to the Dissenters, who now form the United Presbyterian Church. The manifesto seems to anticipate the not unnatural objection to the formation of a new Church, that here were existing orthodox Presbyterian Churches—why not join them? The answer is conclusive. That would be against our principles. And in two very eloquent pages—for the writer was Dr Chalmers—the Establishment principle is urged upon those addressed, in the most peremptory terms, as being still binding on them as "a doctrine or article of faith"—the Voluntaries are warned that they mistook the Free Church if they conceived them to be Voluntaries; and it is emphatically asserted for the Free Church that, "though we quit the Establishment we go out on the Establishment principle; we quit a vitiated Establishment, but would rejoice in returning to a pure one." The same attitude is politely but firmly expressed in the General Assembly's replies to the various bodies of Voluntaries who addressed the Free Church with congratulations at the time of the disruption. They are all asked not to mistake the Free Church for Voluntaries.

The conclusion which I draw from all this is that it was of the essence of the foundation to which this property belongs that it should be a Church separate from Voluntary Dissenters. On broader grounds, though closely connected, it is difficult to see how the pretensions of the Free Church, such as they were, could have been embodied in anything but a Church of her own. Her theory was that she was, amid right-hand and left-hand defections, the Church of Scotland—the Church of the first and the second Reformations—the burning bush, never consumed. With all Presbyterians, this is a noble claim to allegiance; nor was it the less inspiring in 1843, because the Church had been (as she held) unjustly deprived of the benefits of Establishment, and her loyalty to the principle of national religion was proving itself to be of the sort that is true although it be not shone upon.

Now, in dealing with the question before your Lordships' House, it is necessary from the outset to bear firmly in mind that the Establishment principle can be held by Churches that, in fact, are unconnected with the State, and are, in fact, supported by voluntary contributions alone. I should have thought this the necessary hypothesis of the whole question, as we have to do with a dissenting Church; but in two passages of the learned Judges' opinions, afterwards to be adverted to, this seems to be forgotten.

Again, the intrinsic importance of any particular doctrine in relation to the general body of Christian teaching is no criterion of whether it is or is not an essential or fundamental doctrine in a particular Church, and least of all in Scotland. It is not its own importance, but the place assigned to it in the foundation of the new Church that has got to be ascertained. I dwell on this for a moment, and illustrate it from the case in hand. Whether the Establishment principle is or is not a fundamental doctrine of the Free Church is the dispute in this case; but there is no doubt at all that the claim of the Free Church as against the Law Courts (I put it shortly) is of the essence of her foundation. This question is settled, not because the Judges or your Lordships so appraise that doctrine, in comparison with all the various doctrines of faith and morals set out in the Confession of Faith, but because that was the undoubted ground on which the new Church was set up. Now, I observe in Lord Low's very able judgment that he makes much of the fact that here were two Churches identical in doctrine, worship, and form of government, and they were working together in the same field, so that their agencies overlapped and their efforts were to some extent wasted. And his Lordship goes on to speak of the duty of unity among Christians.

This is all very true; but then these considerations were full in view of the founders of the Free Church. This is not a case where the new Church was set up in Scotland to preach the Gospel to people who were not within reach of the common doctrines of Christianity, or even of Calvinistic Christianity. In the theory of the founders of the Free Church, it was intolerable that their adherents, although agreeing in all other matters, should continue to worship along with those who were content that the Court of Session should force the Presbytery to ordain the patron's presentee and do all the various things which led to the Disruption. In fact, again, they set up their churches side by side with those of the other Presbyterian bodies who also held exactly the same doctrinal standards. And the evil consequences of having two separate churches instead of one, which Lord Low adverts to, being palpable and flagrant, then as now, the just inference seems to be that the founders of the Free Church deemed the difference between themselves and the Voluntaries so vital that the duty of Christian unity must give way to the more imperious duty of Christian fidelity to truth. In the same fashion the older secessions had taken place on questions not about any of the doctrines of personal religion or of theology, but about Church polity. Questions of polity had, in short, been in Scotland often made the causes of separation between Churches, and in 1843 this unquestionably was again the case. The only question is, Was the doctrine of polity on which the Free Church was founded solely what was called spiritual independence, or did it not also comprehend the Establishment principle?

I am, of course, not to be understood as speaking in praise of separation (or of any doctrine on one side or another of this dispute), but no one will understand the present case unless he receives into his mind the possibility of people valuing separation as a safeguard for doctrines which they hold intensely, and as to which they know that the surrounding world is indifferent or hostile. And the error of the respondents seems to me to be that, shutting their eyes to the extremely special and limited raison d'être of the Free Church, and contemplating themselves as a Christian Church, they measure the importance of any doctrine in relation to Christianity as a whole, and not with reference to their own distinctive origin.

Another fallacy must be guarded against. To prove that spiritual independence is more important than the Establishment principle is only to prove that the latter is in importance subordinate to the former; but it does not entitle us to call the Establishment principle a principle of subordinate importance. The true question, as I view the matter, is whether the two doctrines (spiritual independence and Establishment) have not been made by the founders of the Free Church complementary parts of one doctrine.

The instrument of the highest and most direct authority, as evidencing the position of the Free Church, is the Protest of 1843. It was by Act of Assembly enjoined on the Presbyteries to record this Protest, together with the Act of Separation and Deed of Demission, at the beginning of their presbytery books as the ground and warrant of their proceedings. The Protest seems to me, on the face of it, amply to support the "Affectionate Representation" (already referred to) in the assertion that "we come out on the Establishment principle." The Protest is that it shall be lawful to them, in the circumstances in which they are placed, to withdraw from the existing Establishment (as if this act required defence); but they make this protest "while firmly asserting the right and duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's Word, and reserving to ourselves and our successors to strive by all lawful means, as opportunity shall in God's providence be offered, to secure the performance of this duty agreeably to the Scriptures," and so on. Your Lordships have doubtless read the document as a whole, and there is nothing in the context which detracts from the significant and solemn emphasis of what I have quoted. They had come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances in which they found themselves, "a Free Assembly of the Church of Scotland as by law established cannot at this time be holden," and therefore, and therefore only, they came out.

The Claim, Declaration, and Protest of 1842 is referred to in the Protest of 1843 as setting forth the true constitution of the Church. Now, Lord Low, admitting that in this document also the Establishment principle is affirmed, remarks that it is "in a parenthetical way." The simple explanation of the form of the sentence, and of the lesser saliency of the position assigned to that principle in this paper, is that it is a manifesto from and by an Established Church. The motive of the paper is to protest against interference with the judicatories of that Church. Accordingly, the hypothesis is that Establishment as a principle requires no vindication or assertion; and it in fact only enters the argument when the loss of Establishment is referred to as one of the national dangers impending. But the references in this connection are of unmistakable import.

The unqualified language of the Protest of 1843, the document which, as we have seen, each presbytery was to take as the warrant of its proceedings, stands witness, therefore, of the distinctive principles of the Free Church. I have already spoken of the Affectionate Representation of 1843 as the manifesto on which endowment was invited; and these two historical papers are those which bear most directly on the question, What are the trusts of this foundation?

There are a number of authoritative documents of the General Assembly in following years, and having examined them all I find them all to bear out the statements made to the public in the Affectionate Representation. The degree of prominence attached to the one or the other of the Church's doctrines of course depends on the occasion of the pronouncement, and it would be unfair to isolate any statement from its motive and context. I shall mention three utterances as instructive in more ways than one, especially as the first of these is founded on by the respondents.

In 1851 (the matter in hand rendering this appropriate) it is spiritual independence that is put into the "parenthesis" and the Establishment principle that is substantively asserted. "While this Church has ever held that she possesses an independent and exclusive jurisdiction or power in all ecclesiastical matters," and so on, "she has at the same time always strenuously advocated the doctrine taught in Holy Scripture, that nations and their rulers are bound to own the truth of God and to advance the Kingdom of His Son." The Assembly goes on, in a historical review of Scottish history, to illustrate how this had been done and how it had not been done, the first instances approved being the statutes establishing the Church in 1567 and 1592. Now, in this paper there occurs a passage which has been founded on by the respondents in which the Assembly says that "it is her being free and not her being established that constitutes the real historical and hereditary identity of the Reformed National Church of Scotland." Of course it is not the fact of her being established that constitutes the identity, or the Free Church claim would be impossible. But I entirely fail to see what this has to say to the principle of Establishment. This argument of the respondents is merely another instance of the recurring fallacy which confuses the fact of a Church being established with the holding by a Church of the Establishment principle.

The "Act VII. 1853" is "anent the principles of the Church"; it is short and unequivocal, and it contains an authoritative exposition or gloss of the Claim, Declaration, and Protest of 1842 and the Protest of 1843. It "declares that this Church maintains unaltered and uncompromised the principles set forth in the Claim, Declaration, and Protest of 1842 and the Protest of 1843 relative to the lawfulness and obligation of a scriptural alliance between the Church of Christ and the State." It will be remembered that in the Protest the protestors reserved to themselves and their successors "to strive by all lawful means to secure the performance of the duty of the State to support an Establishment of religion in accordance with God's Word." So now the General Assembly goes on to explain that there is not, in 1853, any "present call" to take steps in that direction. This, the return to a purified Establishment, was the only "union" ever thought of by the old Free Church.

The only other Act of Assembly of the Free Church to which I need refer is that of 1873, in which, in full view of the United Presbyterians—for the Act relates to the mutual eligibility of their ministers—the Assembly "declare their adherence to the great fundamental principles of this Church, regarding, first, the sole and supreme authority of the Lord Jesus Christ" (I need not quote this in full—it is the doctrine of spiritual independence); and, secondly, "the prerogative of the Lord Jesus Christ as head over all things to His Church and supreme over nations and their rulers, who are consequently bound collectively and officially as well as individually and personally to own and honour His authority, to further the interests of His holy religion, and to accept the guidance of His Word as making known His mind and will." We are now, in 1873, entering the zone of negotiation, and the language is becoming a little general; but the important thing is that the doctrine about the State, whatever it was, is put abreast of the doctrine about spiritual independence, the two being declared "great fundamental principles of this Church." And what the second of these doctrines was in 1843 is not in doubt.

What has now been said relates to authoritative declarations of the Free Church herself; and now a word must be said of her inherited standards. I shall put the argument very low indeed when I say that the Confession of Faith, on the face of it, is consistent with the high place given by the Disruption leaders to the Establishment principle. It is quite certain that the Confession of Faith is inexorably opposed to the theory of religious equality, which is, as we have seen, to this day avowed by the United Presbyterians, who now form part of the respondents' Church. The notion that the State is to stand neutral between good religions and bad, which is what is meant by religious equality, is diametrically opposed to the whole teaching of John Knox. Upon this subject, and on this occasion, I cannot do better than quote from one of the Disruption leaders themselves, the historian of "The Ten Years' Conflict" (1876 edition, pp. 39 and 41 of vol. i.). "Knox," says Dr Robert Buchanan, "and his enlightened and able associates were clear and decided about these two things: first, that no State can, without grievous sin, lend its countenance to the Roman Antichrist or to any false religion whatever; and, second, that every State is bound to embrace, acknowledge, and encourage the true religion." "In Scotland, as everywhere else, at the period of the Reformation, the duty of the State to own and uphold the true religion was looked upon as a first principle, which did not require and hardly admitted of discussion." To those who realise the high theocratic views of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in Scotland, it is easy to understand that the autonomy of God's Church and the duty of the State to support it were but two essential parts of the one great conception of a Christian nation. And this is in truth the clue to the Disruption documents.

On the specific question about the 23d chapter of the Confession of Faith, I own that I read with some surprise that doubts had been entertained by learned Judges as to the effect of the words that it is the duty of the civil magistrate to "take order that" "the ordinances of God" be "duly settled, administered, and observed." I must still take leave to think that those words do describe what we call Establishment; and I observe that in the Campbelton Case,[1] where these observations were made, the question before the Court was State endowment, which is a different thing.

On all the grounds which I have stated, I come to the conclusion that the doctrine of Establishment was one of the distinctive and fundamental doctrines of the Free Church.

I shall now mention one or two points in the judgments in the Court of Session, so far as relating to that question, which demand attention. Lord Trayner, whose judgment is most clear, has stated a very curious objection to the likelihood of the Establishment principle being a fundamental doctrine of a Church. His Lordship finds it "difficult to hold that a mere opinion as to what some third person was bound to do, which he might neglect or refuse to do, and which the Church could not compel him to do, could in any way be an essential part of the constitution of the Church which held that opinion." This difficulty really arises out of the time-honoured personification of the State as the civil magistrate. It would certainly not have been admitted by John Knox, even when Queen Mary represented the civil magistrate. And in these latter days of popular power the civil magistrate sits in every pew, and his religious duty may be preached from every pulpit.

Macalister v. Young.

Again, Lord Trayner thinks that "the history of the Free Church shews that as a Church, apart from the opinions of individual members, it did not regard the Establishment principle as one of its fundamental principles." I pause to observe that I have founded in no instance on the opinion of individual members, but on the collective and official declarations of the Church. Now, his Lordship's first point is, "It was from the commencement and down to the date of its union a Church conducted and maintained in point of fact according to the voluntary principle. If in theory it was something else, the theory did not square with the fact." This comes to no more than that the Free Church had not, in fact, State endowment, which is the hypothesis, without which no question could arise. His Lordship's next point is that the Free Church not only did nothing to give effect to the Establishment principle, but, on the contrary, devoted much of its time and energy to bring about, if it could, the disestablishment of the Church of Scotland. Now, this agitation took place only in the later and, as the appellants would say, the backsliding days, when union with the Voluntaries also came in view. The important correction to be made is that nothing of this kind took place in times which in any possible view can be looked to as evidencing the principles of the Church set up in 1843, and, therefore, as fixing the score of this foundation.

I find in Lord Trayner's judgment an antithesis set up between matter of faith (and sometimes the Latin equivalent is used) and matter of polity. This can only be important if what is matter of polity, as distinguished from matter of faith, cannot be made by a Church one of its distinctive and fundamental doctrines in the sense of this controversy. I have already given my reasons for thinking this untenable, and the distinction, therefore, inconclusive.

The Lord Justice-Clerk attaches very great, and Lord Trayner great, importance to the decision in the Campbelton[1] case, to which I have already alluded. Now, that decision was that the principle of State endowment was not an essential or fundamental doctrine of a particular congregation in Campbelton. It was not a Free Church congregation at all, and the question arose before 1843. The Judges thought that its mere adherence to the Confession of Faith did not pledge that congregation to the doctrine of State endowment. But what in my judgment ties the Free Church to the doctrine now in question is a series of acts with which the Campbelton congregation had nothing to do, and the doctrine is State Establishment.

I must add that the grounds upon which the Lord Justice-Clerk comes to the conclusion that the principle of Establishment was in the early days of the Free Church treated as "subordinate" do not seem very cogent. In the first place he quotes, as proving the doctrine of "the early days," two documents which belong to the later days, 1871 and 1873, and must be read in the light of their dates. But, further, to say that in 1843 the "principle" of Establishment was "repudiated" is to ignore the whole theory of the appellants' case and the argument it gives rise to.

Lord Low decided the case on the ground that the Establishment principle was not so essential that the General Assembly could not depart from it. He expresses a cautious and guarded view as to its power to deal with what he deems more essential doctrines. The Lord Justice-Clerk seems to take much the same view, but he rates very high the "legislative" power of the Church. Lord Trayner, however, takes a much bolder position: "Esto that the Establishment principle had been explicitly declared in 1843 to be an essential principle of the Free Church, I think the Church had the power to abandon that principle, and to that extent alter the original constitution." Lord Trayner's view was argued at your Lordships' bar with great vigour and confidence.

Before proceeding to consider this argument, I ought to point out that the judgment of Lord Young is wholly rested upon the ground, stated in very sweeping terms, that there is nothing to prevent a dissenting Church from abandoning a religious doctrine, however essential and fundamental, and that an ex facie absolute property title cannot be limited by reference, not expressed, to "the essential doctrines and fundamental principles in the constitution of the Church." It is unnecessary to say more of this ground of judgment than that it is in flat contradiction of the decision of your Lordships' House in the case of Craigdallie.[1]

The more plausible theory of the respondents is that there are to be found inherent in the Free Church some extremely elastic powers of altering her constitution. Those powers, it is said, were as much a quality of the Free Church when it received the endowments now in dispute as the doctrine of Establishment, and any one giving to the Church gave on that footing. This must mean, if it has any effect on the present controversy, that such alterations may be made by a majority of the General Assembly with the consent of a majority of presbyteries. The extent of the powers so claimed is shewn by the respondents' counsel having avowed that they held that the Free Church could do away with the Confession of Faith as one of her standards; and Lord Trayner is not prepared to say that the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ does not stand in the same precarious position.

I shall state in advance the answers to this view, and then examine the opinions of the Court in a little more detail.

First, the learned Judges have greatly overrated the "legislative" power of the Church, misled by what I think an erroneous construction of the Barrier Act. Second, putting this legislative power as high as you choose, it is a power affecting the internal affairs of the Church, and has no relation at all, and for historical reasons could not have, to such operations as this union of 1900. Third, the Lord Justice-Clerk has been completely misinformed as to the tenets of the three dissenting bodies whose unions with the Church of Scotland in 1839, and the Free Church in 1853 and 1876, his Lordship regards as precedents; and this error brings to the ground the argument from actual practice.

The main ground of the respondents' argument is the Barrier Act of 1697. It is an Act of the General Assembly, and Lord Trayner says that it "confers" on the Assembly a certain legislative power. Now, if the Barrier Act be examined it will be seen that it does not "confer" or purport to "confer" any legislative power. What it does is, it imposes certain checks on sudden alterations or innovations in doctrine, worship, discipline, or government. The respondents' argument is that this implies that the General Assembly has unlimited power of legislation in the matters named. I do not think this a legitimate deduction. The Act, on the contrary, rather hints that some recent Acts had been of questionable legality, or at least had not commanded "exact obedience." It names doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, not as being the ambit of the Assembly's power, but as the regions of apprehended attack. When all this is read in the light of contemporary history, the motive of the Barrier Act is obvious as a desire to ward off incursions of the Episcopalians. And I do not think that at the very most it comes to more than furnishing some evidence that the General Assembly either had been dealing, or might be induced to deal, with those high matters. The respondents' argument incidentally called attention to a prior Act of Assembly about innovations, which is instructive in the same direction. For this Act, August 6, 1641, forbids novation in doctrine to be brought in or practised in the Kirk unless it be first propounded, examined, and allowed in the General Assembly. The inference from this, if the respondents' argument were applied to it, must be that, according to use, novations in doctrine had formerly been brought in by the inferior Courts or officers of the Church, and that this was the law.

But on the question of historical fact there is no need to rely on the implications (for they are no more) of one Act of Assembly. Where is the Act—where are the Acts—which evidence the actual exercise of those powers? The respondents' appeal to the Act of 1560, adopting Knox's Confession of Faith, entirely fails them. It was adopted by the Estates, as Mr Taylor Innes very justly observes in a passage which appears in the first, though not in the second edition of his admirable work on Creeds. "Nothing," he says, "can be clearer than that the doctrine was not adopted in any way upon the authority of the new-born or Reformed Church; all the forms of free and deliberate voting of the doctrine as truth, as the creed of the Estates, not of the Church, were gone through." Of the other most extreme instances of independent action which were cited, it may be observed that the Book of Discipline was not an alteration of an existing creed, except to the indirect extent to which an added standard usually affects the authority of the old, even if (as here) both old and new were consentaneous; that the adoption of the Covenant was a revolutionary act in a revolutionary time; that the Westminster Confession of Faith, while it was adopted by the General Assembly (with certain qualifications), was the offspring of parliamentary action, initiated before the General Assembly took it up. Of the two modern instances, the Chapel Act and the Veto Act, the Chapel Act was held by its authors to be so clearly declaratory that it was not sent down to presbyteries under the Barrier Act, and the whole theory of the Free Church party was that neither Act was an alteration of the constitution of the Church, so much so that the Assembly hesitated before sending the Veto Act to the presbyteries.

The case of the respondents, therefore, on the Barrier Act does not stand the test of examination, and does not support their theory that, in giving to the Free Church, the pious founders of the Free Church were knowingly giving to a Church one of whose inherent qualities was that she could alter her essential principles. Neither history nor law make this out.

The House is in a much better position to deal with this question after the rehearing than before it, because of the complete presentation in print of the historical documents relied on. In my own case, a very careful study of those papers has largely increased my confidence in rejecting the respondents' argument. I find nothing from beginning to end which supports the theory that the Church of Scotland exercised or claimed the right to alter doctrines which she had asserted to be scriptural. (I am not now, of course, speaking of the doctrine of Establishment, which is in dispute, but of doctrine generally, and more especially of the Confession of Faith.)

Amid the mass of documents the Second Book of Discipline has been confidently relied on by the respondents. Conceding, as I think is their right, that this book was an adopted standard of the Free Church, I fail to discover in it any help in their present trouble. That it stood them in good stead about non-intrusion is certain, but this is not hujus loci. What strikes any one who reads the book through is that it is not, and does not purport to be, a picture of an existing institution, and even as an ideal it is vague. As matter of fact, it was promulgated before the system of Presbyterian government had been systematised and set up in Scotland. It is not surprising, therefore, that beyond negativing the theory of Episcopacy it contains no recognisable description of the Scotch Presbyterian Kirk as an ecclesiastical organism, and more particularly it never confronts the question with which your Lordships have to deal, namely, what control has that ecclesiastical organism, even when taken as a whole (and still less when examined in its parts), over her doctrine? The truth is that here, as throughout the case, the respondents mistake the emphatic denial of the right of the State to meddle with those matters for an assertion of the right of the Church to absolute power over her own declared doctrine. The passage mainly relied on (Chapter VII., head 8) proves too much, for it applies to all the four kinds of Assemblies; but, on the face of it, it deals with ordinances depending for their utility on circumstances of time and place, and this cannot possibly include doctrine. The only hint or reference to the subject of doctrine in relation to a judicatory (in VII., 25) would rather imply that œcumenical councils are the bodies to declare doctrine; but this is not clear, and it is enough to say that the subject now before us is not dealt with in relation to the Scotch Kirk.

One admitted fact, indeed, in what may be called the consuetudinary law or common law of the Established Church and the Free Church, directly negatives this theory of the unrestricted command of the Church over her creeds. The General Assembly itself is made up of Commissioners, and each commission is in writing. By immemorial custom, this commission bears that the Commissioners are to repair to the Assembly "and there to consult, vote, and determine, in all matters that come before them, to the Glory of God and the good of the Church according to the Word of God, the Confession of Faith, and agreeably to the constitution of the Church, as they shall be answerable." Now I must own my inability to see how it would fall within this mandate to do away with, or help to do away with, the Confession of Faith as a standard of the Free Church; and I mention this as testing the argument for the unlimited power of the General Assembly under the Barrier Act.

It has, indeed, been attempted to use one remark of Lord Cranworth in Forbes v. Eden[1] as implying that in all Churches there is a legislative power. The case was that of a specific change in one of the canons of the Scottish Episcopal Church made by the Synod of that body, and I do not think it was laid down as law that powers of legislation are necessarily inherent in every dissenting body, this being in each case really a question of fact. But Lord Cranworth's remarks make perfectly clear that what he is speaking of is entirely internal regulation, and it is here that the whole argument of the respondents about legislation falls short of the required conclusion.

To revert to the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. It may be a merit or a demerit, but the original and historical theory of the Reformed Church of Scotland was that within and not outside her pale was truth to be found. Without were Prelatists and Papists. When, later on, some Presbyterians had held aloof from the Revolution settlement, and, still later, others had made the several secessions of the eighteenth century, their attitude and the attitude of their parent Church never raised the question of comprehension, the seceders in more than one instance having been deposed. The single instance which we referred to in pre-disruption days of a dissenting body coming back into the Church was the return of the Associate Synod in 1839, and it is enough to say that while the Act of Assembly is called "Act anent Reunion with Seceders," each office-bearer of the Associate Synod was required, before taking his seat as a member of presbytery, to subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith and the formula of the Church of Scotland; and this being done they were "received," and were declared to enjoy all the rights and privileges of ordained ministers and elders of the Church of Scotland. In passing, it may be noticed that one of the recitals in the Act is, "whereas the members of the Associate Synod do heartily concur with us in holding the great principle of an ecclesiastical establishment and the duty of acknowledging God in our national as well as our individual capacity." The only reservation made by the returning dissenters was "reserving only to themselves the right which the members of the Established Church enjoy, of endeavouring to correct in a lawful manner what may appear to them to be faulty in its constitution and government." If it had been desired to furnish an illustration of a contrast to the union now in question, it would have been difficult to picture one more complete than the one thus supplied by history.

The second case of "union" is that of the Original United Seceders, another of the bodies who held by the covenanting traditions. They, in 1852, had come to be satisfied that "we may, with honour and consistency, drop our position of secession and maintain our principles in communion with the Church of Scotland," i.e., the Free Church. Accordingly they were "received and admitted" by the Free Church "as pastors, congregations, and kirk-sessions of the Free Church of Scotland."

The other case of union took place in 1876, also in the days of the Free Church. It is founded upon by the Lord Justice-Clerk in his judgment under a misapprehension, which unfortunately enters pretty deeply into his Lordship's judgment. The Lord Justice-Clerk says of the Reformed Presbyterian Church that it "certainly did not hold the Establishment principle"; and for this surprising statement he gives as his reason that since 1689 they declined to become members of the Church of Scotland as established, abode by their objections to the Revolution settlement, and did not "commit" themselves "to an approval of an alliance of the Church with the British State as at present constituted, having in view especially the unscriptural character of its ecclesiastical relations." Now, so far from the Reformed Presbyterians not holding the Establishment principle, they were the ecclesiastical heirs of the Covenanters, who held it passionately, and they represented the extreme right in Presbyterian orthodoxy. But they washed their hands of the Revolution settlement, because the same State which established the Presbyterian Church in Scotland ignored the "second Reformation," and established in England the Prelatical Church, against which woe had never ceased to be denounced by the Church of the second Reformation. Accordingly, the attitude of the Reformed Presbyterians on the Establishment question was exactly analogous to that of the Free Church—holding the Establishment principle, they held aloof from the existing Establishment because, as they held, constituted on wrong terms. The statement of the Lord Justice-Clerk, therefore, can only be supported if his Lordship means that men do not hold the Establishment principle if they decline to join the Establishment as constituted at the time. And if this be sound, it furnishes (as already pointed out) a very simple end of the present case.

The net result, then, of the history of these unions is this, and nothing more, that where the General Assembly have been satisfied about Presbyterian bodies that they held the same standards as themselves, and were sound on the Establishment principle, those bodies have been admitted with full honours.

I have hitherto discussed the case relating to the general property of the Free Church, and I have come to the conclusion that the appellants are entitled to prevail. The other action only differs because of the Model Trust Deed. Of it I have only to say that it is, and was treated in its inception as, a conveyancer's instrument; that its clauses about union seem to me to apply necessarily only to such unions as were competent to the Free Church; and that they are entirely satisfied, and were probably suggested, by such cases as had occurred. It is not in such a deed that you can look for constitutional changes, or for new powers not hitherto possessed.

Regarding the whole of the property now in dispute, I cannot see how, in law or in fairness, a majority of the men who acquired it on the representations made in the Affectionate Representation could have been allowed, say in 1850, to carry off the property to the Voluntaries and come forward, arm in arm with the Voluntaries, and claim it for the fused body. And after all the argument we have heard, I have discovered no reason which makes that fair and lawful in 1900 which would not have been so fifty years earlier.

A serious and weighty argument was adressed to your Lordships on both sides of the bar relating to the Confession of Faith. That argument treated of two separate matters which in my judgment must be separately considered.

No. 1.
Aug. 1, 1904.
Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun.
Macalister v. Young.

The first is whether the respondents have not deposed the Confession of Faith from its place of authority as a standard of the Church, and whether this of itself does not take them outside the trusts under which the property is held. The second and quite separate question is whether on one specific doctrine, namely, Predestination, the new formulary is not contradictory of the Confession of Faith.

On the former of these questions my judgment is in favour of the appellants. First of all, I put aside any confusion which may arise from the substitution of the Westminster Confession for John Knox's Confession. It is with the Westminster Confession that we have to do, and it seems to me that if anything is certain, it is that the Free Church was pledged to the doctrine of the Westminster Confession as her doctrine and the doctrine of her office-bearers. Through all her history, and at every crisis of her history, assuming her identity with the historical Church of Scotland, she proclaimed this on the house-tops and in the most solemn and deliberate of her testimonies. Freed from State interference in 1843, she proceeded to fasten on herself the old obligations. Of her rights in judicial cases to construe the Confession of Faith there is no need to speak. But that the Confession of Faith is "the truths of God" was solemnly attested to be the personal belief of all who signed it. That this was found to be a hard yoke is credible, and has been asserted. Of the means at the command of the Free Church to alleviate this pressure I do not know. But what she has now done is to substitute a belief in "the doctrine of the Church as expressed in the Confession of Faith," and the general words in the first of the declarations adopted by the United Assembly on 31st October 1900 make it plain that the doctrine of the Church, as part of her constitution, is intended to be mutable. This places the Confession of Faith in a precarious instead of a stable position, and in my opinion this is an abandonment of an essential characteristic of the Free Church.

Such being my opinion on the more general question as to the Confession of Faith, I deem myself absolved from the necessity of entering on that one of its articles which has been separately discussed, namely, Predestination.

I am of opinion that in both cases the judgments ought to be reversed, with costs.

Lord Lindley.—In the year 1900 the Free Church of Scotland (which the pursuers and appellants claim to represent) and the United Presbyterian Church united and formed the United Free Church of Scotland. Property previously held by trustees in trust for the Free Church was transferred to trustees in trust for the united body, i.e., the United Free Church; and the question raised by the first appeal is whether this transfer of property was or was not a breach of trust and invalid, although sanctioned by the General Assembly of the Free Church and by the great majority of the members thereof. The Court of Session decided this question against the pursuers, and they have appealed to your Lordships' House against this decision.

The second appeal relates to property conveyed to trustees for particular congregations of the Free Church, the trusts of which are fully set out in the Model Trust Deed of 1844, which is one of the most important documents in the case. The question raised by the second appeal is whether the trusts declared by that deed are confined to members of the Free Church, represented by the appellants, or whether the trusts are wide enough to include all the members of the United Free Church formed in 1900. The Court of Session decided this question also against the appellants.

Both appeals are really based upon the ground that the union of the two Churches could not be legally effected consistently with the constitution and standards of the Free Church, and that consequently the transfer of the property of that Church to the United Free Church was a breach of trust and invalid; and that as regards the congregational property, the benefit of the trusts of the Model Trust Deed can only be enjoyed by persons professing the doctrines which the appellants contend were the unalterable doctrines of the Free Church.

The whole controversy turns on the powers of the General Assemblies of the Free Church. If they have no power to relax the fetters which the appellants contend bound the Free Church hard and fast from its birth, then these appeals ought to succeed. But if, as the Courts in Scotland have held, the General Assemblies of the Free Church have power to do what they have done, then these appeals must fail. I propose, therefore, to confine my observations entirely to this one crucial question.

The circumstances which led to the secession of the founders of the Free Church from the Established Church and the views of the seceders are fully set out in the Claim, Declaration, and Protest of 30th May 1842, and in the Protest of 18th May 1843. These documents and the Model Trust Deed framed on the basis of these documents in 1844 shew that whilst the seceders renounced all the benefits derived by the Established Church from its connection with the State, and shook off so far as they could all interference and control by the State, yet they clung tenaciously to the Holy Scriptures, the Westminster Confession, the two Catechisms, and the Second Book of Discipline, and regarded them as determining and regulating their doctrine, worship, discipline, and government. The government of the Church is declared to be in the hand of the Church officers, which means in the last resort the General Assembly. The powers of this body, as originally established, are to be found in the Westminster Confession and in the Second Book of Discipline; but the Free Church greatly enlarged these powers in 1843 and 1851, as will be seen presently. The Claim, Declaration, and Protest above referred to treat the immunity of the General Assembly from all State control as a fundamental principle of the Church of Scotland; and the Free Church was formed in order to secure this immunity more completely than the Civil Courts had declared to be possible for members of the existing Established Church. Freedom from all State control in spiritual matters, as understood by Free Churchmen, is the raison d'être of the Free Church. The address to Her late Majesty (30th May 1842), the Act of Separation and Deed of Demission by Ministers (23d May 1842), and the Deed of Demission by Elders (30th May 1843), which followed it, all put this as the great object of the whole movement. At the same time the claims of the seceders are declared to be based on the constitution and standards of the Church of Scotland as heretofore understood; and in particular they considered it the duty of the State to promote religion as inculcated in the Westminster Confession and the other standards of the Established Church. By the expression "heretofore understood" I think is meant understood by the Church of Scotland unfettered by legislation and by legal decisions based upon it.

I must now invite your Lordships' attention to the powers of a General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, as declared in the Second Book of Discipline (1578), the Westminster Confession (1643, ratified by statute 7th June 1690), and the Barrier Act (1697).

The Second Book of Discipline is referred to in the Claim, Declaration, and Protest of 1842 as one of the Church's authorised standards, and in the Act and Declaration of 1851 (which will be hereafter mentioned) as one of her earliest standards. It is a work of great authority. Speaking of Assemblies, it is laid down (Chapter VII., s. 8): "They have power also to abrogate and abolish all statutes and ordinances concerning ecclesiastical matters that are found noisome and unprofitable, and agree not with the time, or are abused by the people." This is a very large legislative power exercisable by General Assemblies of the whole Church, but not I should think by smaller assemblies, whose functions are more circumscribed.

The Westminster Confession is, next to the Holy Scriptures, the most authoritative document of all for members of the Scotch Church. It is plain from the language of this Confession that its framers laid no claim to infallibility for themselves and disclaimed infallibility for the Synods and Councils of the Church which should adopt that Confession (see Chapter XXXI., Article IV.). But although infallibility is denied them, great power is conferred upon them; for Synods and Councils are to determine controversies of faith and to make rules for public worship and government of the Church (see Chapter XXXI., Article III.). Their power is limited to ecclesiastical as distinguished from civil affairs (see Article V.). It is also declared in the Confession itself that the Holy Scriptures are the foundation of the doctrine contained in the Confession, and are to be the foundation of the doctrines of the Church which adopts it (see Chapter I.). In all controversies of religion the Church is finally to appeal unto the Holy Scriptures (Chapter I., Article VIII.).

Chapters I. and XXXI., when read together, appear to me to confer upon Synods or Councils the power of interpreting the Holy Scriptures and the various articles of the Confession when controversies arise as to their meaning; and, as infallibility is disclaimed, it follows that an interpretation put by a Synod or Council on Scripture or the Confession is not binding for all time, but may be modified, or even rejected and be replaced, by another interpretation adopted by a later Synod or Council, and declared by it to be in its judgment the true meaning of the Scriptures or Confession upon the matter in controversy.

I take it to be clear that there is a condition implied in this as well as in other instruments which create powers, namely, that the powers shall be used bona fide for the purposes for which they are conferred. If, therefore, a Synod or Council, under colour of exercising their authority, were to destroy the Church which they were appointed to preserve, or were to abrogate the doctrines which they were appointed to maintain, their acts would be ultra vires and invalid in point of law; and it would be the duty of every Court in the United Kingdom so to hold if the question ever involved a controversy as to civil rights and so arose for judicial decision. For all persons who are members of the Church of Scotland its General Assembly is the highest Council of the Church, and it is difficult to limit the powers conferred upon it by the foregoing documents except by an appeal to the implied condition to which I have referred.

I cannot agree with those who contend that the powers of the General Assembly as declared in these documents are unlimited; but I am not able myself to define the limits of its authority more accurately than above stated. It is probably impossible to draw a sharp line clearly dividing all acts of a General Assembly which are within its power from acts which are beyond it. But it does not follow that it is impossible, or, indeed difficult, to decide in the great majority of cases whether a particular act is within its power or beyond it. Great as the powers are, they are limited by what can be found in the Scriptures. The Church must be a Christian Church and a Reformed Protestant Church. So far all is plain. I should, myself, think that it must be a Presbyterian Church. But this question is disputable and happily does not arise.

That very extensive but not accurately defined powers, both as to doctrine and government, are vested in a General Assembly of the Scottish Church is apparent from the Act of Assembly of 1697, commonly called the Barrier Act. Extensive but undefined power is there unmistakably assumed and recognised; no limit is set to it; but very important machinery is provided for its future exercise to prevent hasty decrees. In that respect the Act is a restrictive Act, for unless the prescribed machinery is adopted, an Act of Assembly cannot become a "binding rule and constitution of the Church." But the restriction only affects procedure; the wide powers of the General Assembly are not curtailed. This Act is, in my opinion, clearly applicable to the General Assemblies of the Free Church. It was included in what was adopted when that Church was created.

If the case now before this House had to be decided on the documents to which I have already alluded, and without reference to any Acts of Parliament or other Acts of Assembly, I should hesitate long before I came to the conclusion that what the appellants mainly complain of was beyond the power of the General Assembly of the Free Church. Any interpretation of the Scripture or of the subordinate standards bona fide adopted by a General Assembly, and held by them better to express the doctrine intended to be expressed by the language used in the Confession itself, cannot, in my opinion, be treated as beyond their power, but is well within it.

But there are other documents which have to be considered, and especially the Model Trust Deed, prepared in 1844 under the instructions of the General Assembly of the Free Church and formally approved and adopted by it in 1851. It is therein recited that it was at all times an essential doctrine of the Church of Scotland that it should have a government in the hands of the Church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate or supreme power of the State, and that this government comprehends "the whole power of the Keys," which expression I understand includes those wide powers to which I have already referred in all matters touching the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church. Then it recites the secession from the Established Church and the formation of "the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland," and the claim of the Free Church to all the powers and privileges and the same internal government, jurisdiction, and discipline according to the true and original principles of the Church of Scotland before the separation. The Model Deed then gives a form of conveyance of property to trustees upon trust declared at great length, but which may be shortly summarised as trusts for the use as a place for religious worship by members of the Free Church. These trusts clearly contemplate the union of the Free Church with "other bodies of Christians as the said Free Church of Scotland may at any time hereafter associate with themselves," and provision is made for worship by such united bodies. The fourth trust is very important. It is to the effect that the trustees shall at all times be subject, in the management and control of the trust property, and in all matters and things connected therewith, to the regulation and direction of the General Assembly for the time being of the said body or united body of Christians. Provision is made for the event of a secession from the Church which will be found in the ninth trust.

These trusts are confined to the congregational property which is the subject of the second appeal: but no one suggests that as regards the constitution of the Free Church and the powers of the General Assembly there is any difference between one set of members and another. In my opinion the Model Trust Deed emphasizes and makes plain much that is obscure when the subordinate standards alone are looked at, especially when the legislation affecting them is borne in mind.

In the year 1844 trustees were appointed to hold any property which might be bequeathed or conveyed to them for the Free Church, and also such places of worship as might be erected on sites granted to trustees nominated by the General Assembly, and also such other places of worship as persons might wish to convey to them on the terms of the Model Trust Deed. A fresh appointment was made in 1871.

I pass on to consider what was done as regards the union of the Free Church with the United Presbyterian Church. Union with other Presbyterian Churches was apparently desired some fifty years ago; but in order to effect Union with the United Presbyterians several arrangements of importance had to be made, particularly with reference to the mutual eligibility of the ministers and other officers of the two bodies to Church offices, and to adjustment of the different views held by the two Churches respecting Predestination and respecting their relation to the State, and the duties of the State as regards religion. It took many years to settle these preliminary matters. In 1892 the General Assembly of the Free Church passed "The Declaratory Act anent Confession of Faith"; and although a small minority of members protested against it, I am quite unable to discover any valid ground for holding this Act to be one which a General Assembly of the Free Church had no power to pass. It no doubt relaxes the excessive stringency of certain articles of the Westminster Confession, if construed literally; but it imposes no new fetters, and in relaxing the old ones, and so rendering them more acceptable to many earnest Presbyterians desirous of remaining in the Church or becoming members of it the General Assembly were honestly attempting to preserve the Free Church and its fundamental doctrines, and, in my opinion, there is no pretence for saying that they were false to their trust and were endeavouring to destroy any doctrines which it was their duty to preserve.

I can understand that an ordinary member of the Free Church brought up from childhood to regard the Confession as an inspired document to be construed literally and in the same sense for all time may think some of the doctrines set forth in this Act unorthodox: but that is not the question on which this appeal turns. The question is whether it is competent for the governing body of that Church, i.e., the General Assembly complying with the conditions of the Barrier Act, to declare that the Confession, properly understood, does not require absolute uniformity of belief on the matters dealt with by the Declaratory Act. This is the great question at issue between the parties to this appeal, and I have come to the clear opinion that on this question the appellants are wrong. I come to this conclusion after a careful examination of the powers of the General Assembly as contained in the documents before referred to. These powers are, in my opinion, as fundamental in the constitution of the Free Church of Scotland, and as essential to its preservation, as any of the doctrines in the Confession or other subordinate standards.

The appellants made a great point of the alteration made by this Declaratory Act in the fundamental doctrine of the Free Church respecting the principle of Establishment, by which I understand is meant the duty of the State to promote religion, and especially the Presbyterian religion, as set forth in the Westminster Confession, and sanctioned by Parliament as already mentioned. Chapter XXIII., Article III., of the Confession declares what in the view of the Church of Scotland is the duty of the State. Its language is very general, and leaves the State to determine in what manner it will perform such duty. Some, at all events, of the founders of the Free Church attached great importance to this principle of Establishment which was not held by all Scotch Presbyterian Churches. But it does not follow that this principle was to be tenaciously adhered to for all time, and that no future General Assembly should have power to modify or relax it if owing to changes of opinion or other circumstances the General Assembly of the Free Church deliberately came to the conclusion that the preservation and healthy growth of the Free Church required the principle to be reconsidered.

I cannot come to the conclusion that the view taken in 1843 of the duty of the State was a fundamental doctrine admitting of no explanation or modification. Dr Chalmers' Address, adopted by the Free Church, shews that he and its then members would have strenuously opposed the change made, but it does not follow that he or they would have denied the power of a future General Assembly to make such change after due deliberation.

As I understand the matter, the Free Church can and does fulfil all her spiritual functions without any State aid, and the attempt to obtain aid from the State, whilst repudiating all State control, has proved a failure. This doctrine as to the duty of the State, whether best described as a political or a religious doctrine is a doctrine, which the General Assembly could, in my opinion, repeal or modify as might be expedient.

In 1900 the Act uniting the two Churches was passed by the Free Church of Scotland after complying with all the conditions of the Barrier Act. The Act was dated 31st October 1900, and the two Churches were then formed into one under the name of the United Free Church of Scotland, and its supreme governing body was designated the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland. Having regard to the constitution of the Free Church, I cannot agree that this union could only be legally valid if assented to by all the members of the Free Church.

As part of this transaction the property held for the Free Church by its trustees was ordered to be conveyed to a new body of trustees for the United Free Church, and this was done; but a dissentient minority protested.

This transfer is complained of by the pursuers, and is sought to be set aside. But having regard to the trusts on which the property of the Free Church was held, and to the powers of its General Assembly, the pursuers have, in my opinion, completely failed to prove any breach of trust or misapplication of the property of the Church. The United Free Church is the Free Church lawfully enlarged; the individuals entitled to the use and enjoyment of the Church property are lawfully more numerous than before. The pursuers in the first appeal have not been unlawfully excluded from such use and enjoyment. There is no evidence that any person has been deprived of the use and enjoyment of any property held in trust for the Free Church or the United Free Church, or any congregation of either, except a few ministers represented by the appellants in the second appeal who repudiate the authority of the General Assembly of the Free Church to make the changes complained of, and who by their own conduct have deprived themselves of their right to the benefit of the trusts on which such property is held. Both appeals are based on the erroneous view that the Free Church had no freedom, but that it was bound hard and fast to certain doctrines expressed in language admitting for all time of only one meaning. I am quite unable so to regard it. The struggle for liberty was not so abortive as that.

In the course of the argument many statutes and decisions were referred to. Those which related to conflicts with the Established Church of Scotland are not so important for the present purpose as those which relate to disputes between members of non-established Churches. The decisions relating to the Established Church (namely, the Auchterarder case,[1] and other Scotch cases referred to in argument) would be all-important if your Lordships had to consider the validity of acts done by the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland; for that Church is governed not only by the Westminster Confession and Acts of Assembly, but also by statutory enactments which make reform in her doctrines, worship, discipline, and government difficult, if not impossible, without legislation. But the Free Church is emancipated from these fetters.

As formed in 1843 the Free Church was purely a voluntary religious association, both Christian and Protestant, and believed by its founders to be divinely instituted, professing doctrines based on the Scriptures and the old subordinate standards, governing itself by certain rules, and providing a representative assembly of its own for explaining its doctrines and for preserving the association by making such changes in its worship, discipline, and government as might be found expedient after consulting the whole body, as required by the Barrier Act. A trust for the Free Church is, in my opinion, a trust for such persons as shall hold the doctrines and submit in ecclesiastical matters to the government and discipline adopted by the founders of the Free Church, with such modifications as may be made from time to time by the General Assembly of that Church, provided the conditions required by the Barrier Act are observed, and provided the Church is preserved as a Reformed Church with Presbyterian government.

There is no statutory or other law which makes such an association illegal or which compels it to accept the Westminster Confession, whether with or without modification. The founders of the Free Church did accept it, but only subject to the powers which they insisted were vested in the General Assembly of that Church. So long, therefore, as the General Assembly does not exceed those powers, or act contrary to some statutory or other law of Scotland, or commit any breach of trust as above explained, it is not the function of any civil Court to interfere with it. This I regard as settled by the decision of your Lordships' House in Craigdallie v. Aikman,[1] Forbes v. Eden,[2] and is in entire accordance with the general law of trusts applicable to such associations as the Free Church—see Attorney-General v. Pearson,[3] Milligan v. Mitchell,[4] Long v. Bishop of Cape Town.[5]

The distinction between an erroneous decision by a body having jurisdiction to deal with a particular subject-matter, and a decision by a body having no jurisdiction over the matter decided, is familiar to all lawyers, and must be steadily borne in mind in this case. In passing the Declaratory Act in 1892 and the Act of Union of 1900 I can discover nothing ultra vires or contrary to any law. Still less can I discover anything ultra vires or contrary to law in the interpretation put by the General Assembly of the Free Church on some of the articles in the Westminster Confession, or in the alterations made in the declarations and forms to be made and signed by the ministers and officers of the Church. It follows that, in my opinion, the transfer of property which is complained of (and which was simply consequential on the Acts of Assembly of 1892 and 1900) was neither ultra vires nor contrary to any law, and cannot therefore be successfully impeached.

The foregoing observations apply to both appeals; but the second appeal appears to me to present less difficulty than the first. I regret that any ministers should have been excluded from their offices; but the trusts declared by the Model Trust Deed are clear and explicit, and their validity cannot be questioned by those who have no title to the property to which it applies except under the provisions of that deed. There has been no breach of the trusts declared by the Model Trust Deed.

I might have contented myself with saying that I concurred in the decision of the Court of Session; but the question between the parties is of such great importance, and its solution requires a careful study of so many documents, statutes, and decisions, that I considered I should not be adequately discharging my duty to this House if I did not set forth, as clearly as I could, the reasons which have induced me to give my voice for the dismissal of both appeals with costs.

LORD ALVERSTONE.—Inasmuch as I am differing in a Scottish appeal from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, affirmed unanimously by the Second Division of the Court of Session, I think it only right that I should state my reasons for the judgment which I am about to give.

The question raised by these appeals is whether funds invested in the names of trustees, and real property held on trust for behoof of the Free Church of Scotland, have been dealt with in a way which constitutes a breach of trust. Both classes of property are now being applied, or it is proposed to apply them, for the purposes of the United Free Church, being a body of Christians formed by a union, or attempted union, of a great majority of the ministers and elders of the Free Church of Scotland with the ministers and elders of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and the point to be decided is whether, having regard to the purposes for which the money and property were originally subscribed, given, bequeathed, or conveyed, such application constitutes a breach of trust.

The union, or attempted union, was assented to and approved of by a very large majority of the ministers and elders and congregations of the Free Church; the actual numbers are not material, but, as I understand, all except some thirty of the ministers approved of the proposed union; but the dissenting minority represent a very considerable body of adherents to congregations of the Free Church who do not approve of, and some of whom have protested against, the proposed union.

The law applicable to funds which have been given for the purpose of a voluntary association such as the Free Church is well settled, and it is not necessary for me to do more than refer to the decision of your Lordships' House in Craigdallie v. Aikman[1] to shew that such funds, in the absence of express provision, must be applied for the benefit of those who adhere to the original principles of the founders. If the terms of the foundation of the trust provide for the case of schism the Courts will give effect to them, but if there be no such provision, the cestuis que trust are those who adhere to the fundamental principles upon which the association was founded.

The Free Church of Scotland was formed in the year 1843 by what is called "the Disruption," or, in other words, the secession from the Established Church of Scotland of a large body of the ministers of the Established Church, who renounced entirely the pecuniary benefits of their connection with the Establishment in maintenance of a protest which they had made against the interference by the civil Courts with rights which they considered to be the rights of the Church.

It is not necessary to trace the history of the Established Church down to 1843, or the history of the various secessions which had taken place before that date, but it is sufficient to say that those who founded the Free Church separated from the Established Church, not upon any question of doctrine, but solely upon the ground which I have just mentioned, and which ground is in no way inconsistent with the principle of Establishment.

The United Presbyterian Church was not then in existence; it was formed in the year 1847 by the union of two Churches which had separated from the Established Church many years before, and were known as the United Associated Synod and the Relief Church.

It is necessary to consider carefully what was the constitution of the Free Church in so far as it throws light upon the question raised for your Lordships' decision, namely, what were the trusts upon which the property in dispute in this action was held?

The first, and in fact the most important, question which arises on this part of the case may be stated as follows: It is maintained by the appellants and denied by the respondents that the principle of Church Establishment was adopted as a fundamental or essential principle of the Free Church of Scotland; and that its founders made that principle one of the main grounds for refusing to join other existing voluntary Churches. It cannot, I think, be doubted that this principle was regarded as being fundamental by the founders of the Free Church, and was put forward as one of the main inducements in the appeals for pecuniary aid, in response to which a very large proportion of the funds and property now held in trust for behoof of the Free Church was given. Upon this part of the case I might content myself with adopting the view which is expressed by the Lord Ordinary, and by more than one of the Judges of the Court of Session. Lord Low, in his judgment,[1] expressed himself as follows:—"There is no doubt that the founders of the Free Church, when they left the Established Church in 1843, did so declaring that they adhered to the principle of an Established Church, and that they seceded only because as the law then stood the Church did not possess that independence in what they regarded as matters spiritual which, in their view, was essential in order to give effect to the cardinal doctrine of the Headship of Christ." And later on:—"The Establishment principle (to use a convenient short phrase) was one which was regarded as of great importance by the Free Church at the commencement of its history, and naturally so, because, in the first place, it justified the action of those who had seceded by proclaiming that they were not schismatics, and, in the second place, the founders of the Church hoped that a change in the law might be effected which would enable them to return to the Establishment." And Lord Trayner says, in even more emphatic language[2]:—"The Free Church, from its constitution in 1843 down (at least) to its union with the United Presbyterian Church, professed the Establishment principle." And: "It was the feature of the Free Church

(prior to the union) which distinguished it from all other Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, that it was the only Presbyterian Church not connected with the State which professed to hold the Establishment principle."

I am aware their Lordships in other parts of their judgments expressed the view that the principle either cannot be regarded as fundamental, or was one from which the General Assembly of the Free Church had power to depart; but I refer to these passages at present only for the purpose of shewing that, having regard to the views held by the founders of the Free Church with reference to the Establishment, their union with the two then existing Churches, which subsequently united to form the United Presbyterian Church, would not at that date, 1843, have been possible.

In view, however, of the great importance of the question, and inasmuch as opinions have been expressed that the principle of Establishment cannot be regarded as fundamental, I think it right, as briefly as possible, to examine the question for myself, and to state the reasons which have led me to the conclusion that it was regarded as a fundamental and essential principle of the Free Church at its foundation, for very many years afterwards, and, as I think, down to the time of the union with the United Presbyterian Church in 1900. Reliance was placed by the appellants upon the language of Article III. of Chapter XXIII. of the Westminster Confession, which is as follows:—"The civil magistrate may not assume to himself the administration of the Word and Sacraments or of the power of the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven; yet he hath authority, and it is his duty to take order that unity and peace be preserved in the Church, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered, and observed. For the better effecting whereof he hath power to call Synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."

It was strongly urged by the respondents that that article does not enunciate the principle of Establishment or Endowment. As regards Endowment the observation is probably well founded, but even taking the article by itself, in my opinion it distinctly embodies the principle of Establishment. Whether this be so or not is not very material upon the point of view which I am at present considering; the more important question is, How was it regarded by the founders of the Free Church?

The first important document is that of 30th May 1842. This was a claim, declaration, and protest made by then ministers of the Established Church before their secession; it is therefore not to be expected that the references to Establishment would be very distinct, but a passage occurs which has not been quoted, and which is in the following words:—"And whereas this Church, highly valuing as she has ever done her connection on the terms contained in the statutes hereinbefore recited with the State, and her possession of the temporal benefits thereby secured to her for the advantage of the people must, nevertheless, even at the risk and hazard of the loss of that connection and of these public benefits—deeply as she would deplore and deprecate such a result for herself and the nation—persevere."

This passage of the declaration which follows, and the concluding words of the Protest, shew that even in a document in which a claim was being made by members of an Established Church to spiritual independence they thought it right to point out the importance which the signatories attached to the principle of Establishment. The principle is, moreover, emphatically enunciated in the document entitled, "The Protest of the Commissioners to the General Assembly, on the 18th May 1843." This being the first Assembly of the then newly-formed Free Church, the words are of such importance that I think it right to quote them:—"And finally while firmly asserting the right and duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an establishment of religion in accordance with God's word, and reserving to ourselves and our successors to strive by all lawful means as opportunity shall, in God's good providence, be offered, to secure the performance of this duty agreeably to the Scriptures and in implement of the statutes of the Kingdom of Scotland and the obligations of the Treaty of Union as understood by us and our ancestors, but acknowledging that we do not hold ourselves at liberty to retain the benefits of the Establishment while we cannot comply with the conditions now to be deemed thereto attached."

It is, in my opinion, significant and to be borne in mind, that this protest was one of the first official acts of the Free Church. As far as I know, there is no document or evidence which suggests that there was at the time of which I am speaking, namely, the year 1843, any doubt or difference of opinion as to that which was understood by the expression the Establishment principle; but it is sufficient for my purpose to quote two passages from the Pastoral Address of 30th May 1843, which was embodied in an Act of the Assembly of the Free Church, and to which the ministers were directed to call the attention of their people on 15th June 1843. These passages from that address state the principle as follows:—"It was ever held by the Established Church indeed that the Church and the State being equally ordinances of God, and having certain common objects connected with His glory and the social welfare, might and ought to unite in a joint acknowledgment of Christ, and in the employment of the means and resources belonging to them respectively for the advancement of His cause." And later:—"So upon the other hand the State held directly and exclusively from God, and was entitled and bound to exercise under its responsibility to Him alone its entire secular sovereignty, including therein whatever it was competent for or binding upon the State to do about sacred things or in relation to the Church, as, for example, endowing and establishing the Church and fixing the terms and conditions of that establishment."

These passages shew clearly what was understood by the founders of the Free Church as the Establishment principle.

I will not quote again the passage from Dr Chalmers' speech in 1843, to which such frequent reference was made, but it is impossible to read it without being satisfied that he at least made the principle of Establishment one of the fundamental principles of the Free Church, and that his view was adopted unanimously by the Assembly on 20th May, who directed that an account of the proceedings of the previous meeting should be sent to the ministers and friends, which account should contain Dr Chalmers' address as Moderator. It should be noted in passing that the Protest of 18th May 1843 was directed to be recorded at the commencement of the presbytery books, and I have not the slightest doubt that those documents to which I have referred were regarded by the ministers and members of the Church as formulating the essential principles upon which the Free Church was founded. It was a time of great excitement, and the attention of the Free Church ministers and their congregations and friends throughout the country would be closely directed to these important documents, and I doubt not that every line would be closely criticised and considered.

There is, moreover, a remarkable confirmation of this view in the language used in reply to the addresses received from Congregational Churches in other parts of the kingdom in the year 1843. I need scarcely point out that in replying to such addresses the elders of the Free Church would have no object in criticising, still less in traversing, any opinions which had been expressed in addresses of a friendly character transmitted to them, and this gives greater force to the language used in reply to such addresses, of which I would cite the two passages set out in the documents before us: "But you misapprehend the nature of the movement which we have made in supposing that we have in the least degree altered our views respecting the lawfulness and the desirableness of a right connection between Church and State" (Printed Papers, Appendix D, p. 21). "History and experience have convinced us that there is a form of alliance which is at once practicable and agreeable to Scripture and highly beneficial. We have renounced the temporal advantages of the Scottish Ecclesiastical Establishment, not in consequence of any alteration in our views on this subject, but because the Civil Courts had violated our constitution; and Parliament, under the guidance of an infatuated Government, had sanctioned that violation."

I pause here to notice an argument strongly urged before us on behalf of the respondents, and which appears to have had weight with the Lord Ordinary and the Judges of the Second Division, namely, that the passages in the documents leading up to the foundation of the Free Church, and in the preamble to the Act of 1846, to which I shall refer, were parenthetical and related to the action of third persons, namely, the civil magistrates, and not of the Church itself. So far from weakening the force of the declaration, couched in the terms in which it is, the fact, in my opinion, gives it additional weight. The separation was in no way promoted because the dissenting ministers objected to the principle of Establishment; that principle was not attacked by the claims of the Courts against which they had protested, and yet its recognition is considered of such great importance as to receive the prominent notice which I have quoted. Then with reference to the argument that it relates to the action of third parties, also strongly pressed upon us, I am unable to see how such an argument assists the respondents. It seems to me also to give additional weight to the firm assertion of the right and duty of Churches to support the State in the performance of its duty towards religion by the medium and through the agency of an Established Church, which assertion the protesting ministers were making.

It seems to me, moreover, that a brief consideration of the Establishment principle as contrasted with the principle of Disestablishment is sufficient to shew its fundamental or essential character. The one seeks to enforce the paramount duty of the State in its official capacity to recognise religion, to maintain and support the Church; the other desires to see all connection between the State and the Church broken down and destroyed, and to prevent the State from exercising any control whatever over the Church in any capacity, and, of course, from endowing or assisting to maintain a church; and if, as I shall point out later, the United Presbyterian Church certainly considered any civil establishment of religion unscriptural and unjust, it is difficult to understand how such a distinction between the views held by two Churches can be regarded as otherwise than fundamental and essential.

Nor does it seem to me that the suggestion made by Lord Trayner that the different view taken on this question by the Free Church and the United Presbyterian is a matter of polity and not a matter of faith makes any substantial difference. In one sense the questions on which the Free Church separated from the Establishment were not matters of faith, but, in my opinion, the difference between the Free Church and the United Presbyterian was a difference, not on a mere matter of detail, but upon a fundamental principle.

For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion that the founders of the Free Church regarded the Establishment principle, not only as one of the very greatest importance, but as fundamental and essential, and that at that date union between the Free Church and either of the Churches subsequently forming the United Presbyterian Church would have been out of the question.

If I am right in this view, its bearing on the question raised before us is of the greatest importance. It cannot, in my opinion, be questioned that the documents to which I have referred and the principles which they embody were the documents upon the basis of which the donors of a very large proportion of the trust funds, the application of which is in question in this case, made their gifts and donations, and upon the faith of which also the real property in question was conveyed.

This conclusion leads me to consider whether the history of the Free Church since 1843 and events since that date support the view that that property held for its behoof may without breach of trust be applied for the purposes of a Church which supports the principle of Disestablishment. I pass, therefore, to consider briefly the history of the Free Church upon this point from 1843 to 1900.

In the year 1846 we find the Church thinking it right to declare that she "firmly maintains the same scriptural principles as to the duties of nations and their rulers in reference to true religion and the Church of Christ for which she has hitherto contended." I regard this as a distinct recognition of the Establishment principle, and in no way weakened by the words following, which disclaim intolerant or persecuting principles. Five years later—in the year 1851—in a formal Act and Declaration of the

Macalister v. Young.

Assembly the principle of Establishment is again recognised as of the highest importance; the words used are: "Holding firmly to the last as she holds still, and through God's grace will ever hold, that it is the duty of civic rulers to recognise the truth of God according to His Word, and to promote and support the Kingdom of Christ without assuming any jurisdiction in it or any power over it, and deeply sensible, moreover, of the advantages resulting to the community at large, and especially to its most destitute portions, from the public endowment of pastoral charges among them."

Again, in the year 1853, the Church, in emphatic language, reaffirms the principle, calling special attention to that of Establishment: "That this Church maintains unaltered and uncompromised the principles set forth in the Claim, Declaration, and Protest of 1842, and the Protest of 1843, relative to the lawfulness and obligation of a Scriptural alliance between the Church of Christ and the State, and the conditions upon which such an alliance ought to be regulated."

In the year 1864, when the question of union between the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church was actually under discussion, the committee of the Free Church stated, as one of its distinctive principles, that, as an act of homage to Christ, it is the duty of the civil magistrate, when necessary or expedient, to employ the national resources in aid of the Church; and again, in the year 1867, the principle is enunciated in even stronger language: "As an act of national homage to Christ the civil magistrate ought, when necessary and expedient, to afford aid from the national resources to the cause of Christ, provided always that in doing so, while reserving full control over his own gift, he abstain from all authoritative interference in the internal government of the Church."

Later, in the year 1873, when dealing with the question of eligibility of ministers, the General Assembly declared that it adhered to the great fundamental principle of the Church under two heads, the second of which was as follows: "Secondly, the prerogative of the Lord Jesus Christ as Head over all things to his Church, and supreme over nations and their rulers, who are consequently bound collectively and officially as well as individually and personally to own and honour His authority to further the interests of His holy religion."

These passages from the proceedings of the Free Church satisfy me that for a period of thirty years after the Free Church was founded the Establishment principle was regarded as fundamental, and I doubt not that during that period, and in reliance on that principle, a considerable part of the property in question was given and conveyed to trustees for behoof of the Free Church.

It was suggested by the respondents that the union of the Free Church with the Church known as the United Original Seceders in the year 1852, and with the Reformed Presbyterian Church in 1876, afforded arguments in support of the union with the United Presbyterian in the year 1900. I am wholly unable to follow that argument. I do not propose to trace the history of the two Churches with which the Free Church united beyond saying that, as far as I can gather from the papers, the Free Church, in uniting with them, in no way abandoned or altered any one of the principles which it had professed in the year 1843, but, on the contrary, both the united Churches represented that they were in complete sympathy with the Free Church. As regards the United Original Seceders, it is only necessary to examine the representation and appeal made by the Synod of that Church in the year 1852 to see that their union with the Free Church was based upon and only consistent with the view that the Free Church still maintained the Establishment principle. In the case of the Reformed Presbyterian Church the statement in the Act of Union that the United Churches accept the preamble to Article XII. of the Free Church Assembly, 1846, which I have already cited, proves, in my opinion, that the maintenance of the Establishment principle was the basis of union between the Free Church and the Reformed Presbyterian.

The action of the Free Church in the years 1892 and 1894, though it must be considered in connection with the question of the powers of the General Assembly, has, in my opinion, very little, if any, bearing upon the point which I am at present discussing. In the first place, these acts were objected to; but I would point out that although the Act of 1892, which is undoubtedly of great importance upon the second branch of the case, has no direct bearing upon the question of Establishment, one of the main grounds of objection and protest was stated in the following terms (Appendix A, p. 134): "Because under the head which refers to intolerant and persecuting principles which is to take the place of the present preamble to the formula, all reference to the duties of nations and their rulers to true religion and the Church of Christ as therein set forth is wholly omitted."

It now becomes necessary to consider the position of the United Presbyterian Church in reference to the Establishment principle. The possibility of a union of the Free Church with other bodies of Christians was undoubtedly contemplated by its founders; two such unions have in fact taken place; it becomes therefore of importance to consider whether or not the United Presbyterian Church was a Church with which the Free Church could properly unite, and whether it would be a breach of trust to apply funds held in trust for behoof of the Free Church as originally constituted to the purposes of the united body, now the United Free Church. In my opinion this matter does not admit of serious doubt. I am aware it was argued by the respondents that the United Presbyterian Church between the years 1847 and 1900 might, without breach of trust, have united with the Establishment, or applied its funds in aid of Establishment, and it was contended by Mr Haldane that the United Free Church could do so without impropriety. Without referring to all the documents which, I think, negative this contention, I would call attention to the view held by the United Presbyterian Church, as stated in the report of 1864, which seems to me to be wholly inconsistent with the argument: "That inasmuch as the civil magistrate has no authority in spiritual things, and as the employment of force in such matters is opposed to the spirit and precepts of Christianity, it is not within his province to legislate as to what is true in religion; to prescribe a creed or form of worship to his subjects, or to endow the Church from national resources; that Jesus Christ as sole King and Head of His Church has enjoined upon His people to provide for maintaining and extending it by free-will offerings, and this being Christ's ordinance it excludes State aid for these purposes; and that adherence to it is the true safeguard of the Church's independence." And again in 1867: "That it is not competent to the civil magistrate to give legislative sanction to any creed in the way of setting up a civil establishment of religion, nor is it within his province to provide for the expense of the ministrations of religion out of the national resources; that Jesus Christ as sole King and Head of His Church has enjoined upon His people to provide for maintaining and extending it by free-will offerings; that this being the ordinance of Christ it excludes State aid for these purposes, and that adherence to it is the true safeguard of the Church's independence. Moreover, though uniformity of opinion with respect to civil establishment of religion is not a term of communion in the United Presbyterian Church, yet the views on this subject held and universally acted upon are opposed to these institutions."

Further, I am wholly unable to reconcile this argument with the statement proved in evidence, and published in 1897 on behalf of the United Presbyterian Church. In that year a tract, No. XXV., prepared by the committee of the United Presbyterian Church on the disestablishment and disendowment of the Established Churches of England and Scotland, was issued by the United Presbyterian Church and sent to all the ministers of the Free and Established Churches. In that tract not only is it stated that the United Presbyterian Church maintains as one of its most distinctive principles that it is not the province of the State to establish and endow the Christian Church, but that civil establishments of religion are unscriptural and unjust. In the face of these documents it seems to me impossible to adopt the contention of the respondents; but here, again, I should be justified in relying upon the opinion of their Lordships in the Scotch Court. In the course of his judgment Lord Low said (Appendix D, p. 58): "On the other hand it seems to me to be equally certain that the United Presbyterian Church never read the Confession of Faith as laying down that it is the right and duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an Established Church. There does not appear to be any material difference between the two Churches upon the point so far as their standards are concerned, but the view of the United Presbyterian Church as a whole has always been that it is not within the province of the civil magistrate to endow the Church out of public funds, and that the Church ought not to accept State aid, but ought to be maintained by the free-will offerings of its members." Lord Trayner, moreover, states in emphatic terms that the United Presbyterian Church had, throughout the whole period of existence, repudiated the Establishment principle.

With reference to the attitude of the United Free Church, and the possibility of its adopting a different view, the statements in the resolutions of the Assembly of the United Free Church, passed in the years 1901 and 1902, to the effect that the Establishment was objectionable on principle, and recording its testimony in favour of disestablishment of the Established Church of Scotland, which statements were not attempted to be qualified by the counsel for the respondents, are, in my opinion, conclusive against any such contention.

The only argument on this point remaining to be noticed is that which was founded upon the documents agreed to by the Assembly of the Free Church and the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church at the time of union.

These documents transfer and convey all the property and funds of the Free Church of Scotland to the united body; but it was said that the modified forms of questions formulated by the General Assembly of the United Free Church in the year 1900 were not inconsistent with the principle of Establishment, in so far as that was a fundamental principle of the Free Church, and that office-bearers were left free to hold their own individual views on this question.

If I am right in the view which I have endeavoured to express, that the principle of Establishment was regarded by the founders of the Free Church as a fundamental principle of that Church, and was so maintained for a period of more than thirty years after its foundation, the fact that the Free Church of Scotland, in uniting with a Church pledged to disestablishment principles, and regarding civil establishments of religion as unscriptural and unjust, had agreed to treat the matter as an open question, seems to me entirely beside the mark for the purposes of the present discussion. The respondents must justify not only a nominal union, but the claim to apply the trust funds to the purpose of the united body, and to dispossess, as they have attempted to do, the Free Church ministers who have declined to join the United Free Church from the possession of their manses and churches. Unless the respondents can make good their point that the application of the moneys for the purpose of the united body does not amount to a breach of trust, the fact that they agreed for the purpose of the union not to raise any question cannot afford a justification.

The only remaining point which requires notice upon this part of the case is the argument that the terms of the Model Trust Deed, which was settled by a committee of the Free Church and approved by the Assembly in 1844, justifies the transfer of the property to the united body. This argument is based mainly upon the first and fourth trusts, and incidentally upon the ninth trust. The object of this trust-deed was undoubtedly to ensure that the property should be held for the purposes of the Free Church as originally constituted. It proceeds upon a general outline of the history of the Established Church, the Disruption, and the subsequent formation of the Free Church. The first trust was, in my opinion, a provision not unnatural from a conveyancing point of view, that the trust should not cease in the event of the Free Church of Scotland uniting with themselves other bodies of Christians. It would in my judgment be contrary to every rule of law applicable to such a case to hold that it gave the Assembly of the Free Church power by mere union to divert the funds to a body which did not conform to the fundamental principles of the Free Church. Still less can the respondents rely upon the fourth trust, which was the natural sequence of the recital (Appendix A, pp. 66 and 67), as to the continuation of the form of Church government by Kirk Sessions, Presbyteries, Provincial Synods, and General Assemblies, and bestowed upon the General Assembly of the Free Church the same powers as those which had been enjoyed and claimed by the Assembly of the Established Church. The ninth clause not only affords no argument for the respondents, but incidentally supports the contention of the appellants. The majority who consented to the union with the United Presbyterian Church did not purport to carry out the object of the Protest of 18th May 1843 more faithfully than the appellants who are the minority. Clause 9 only contemplates an apportionment or division in the event of a section not less than one-third of the whole of the ordained ministers claiming to be carrying out the objects of the Protest more faithfully than the others. In my opinion, this accentuates the extreme importance attached by the Church at its foundation to the Protest of 18th May 1843, and would make it entirely ultra vires of a section of ministers, purporting to act under the ninth trust, to disregard the assertion of right and duty therein made, and to claim under this clause to associate itself with a body which was openly promoting disestablishment.

It is contended by the respondents—and this is really the foundation of the judgment of Lord Young—that the General Assembly had power to legislate in such matters, and to abandon the Establishment principle, even though and notwithstanding that it may have been one of the fundamental principles of the Free Church. This question has a bearing upon the second ground relied upon by the appellants, namely, that the Assembly of the Free Church had departed from the Westminster Confession and the standard of the Church, and had made changes in doctrine inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the Free Church. The powers of the Assembly of the Free Church were, in my opinion, no greater in relation to the fundamental principles upon which that Church was founded than were the powers of the Assembly of the Established Church. If I am right in the view which I have ventured to express, that paragraph 3 of Article XXIII. of the Westminster Confession, and the documents to which I have referred as shewing the fundamental principles upon which the Free Church was founded, did make—to adopt once more the language of the Act of 1873—the Establishment principle one of the great fundamental principles of the Church, I am wholly at a loss to understand upon what ground it can be said that the Assembly either of the Established Church or of the Free Church had the right to permit its ministers and elders to depart from that principle. I agree that the Barrier Act, upon which so much reliance was placed by the respondents, though it confers no new powers, recognises that the General Assembly possesses some powers of alteration with reference to doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, but such powers do not, in my opinion, include a power to subvert or destroy fundamental and essential principles of the Church.

I have now to say a few words upon the second point upon which reliance was placed by the appellants, to the effect that the Free Church, by its Acts of 1892 and 1894, and the Assembly of the United Free Church by their Acts of October 1900, with reference to the questions and formulæ to be used in the ordination and induction of ministers and office-bearers, have departed from the fundamental principle of the Free Church in the matter of doctrine, and particularly in relation to the doctrine of Predestination and free will as set forth in the Westminster Confession.

Free Church of Scotland v. Lord Overtoun.
Macalister v. Young.

For reasons which I will briefly state, had this been the only ground upon which exception could be taken to the action of the Assembly of the Free Church, I am not at present satisfied that it has acted in excess of its powers.

I do not wish to express a final opinion, as I do not consider it necessary for the purpose of determining the legal rights of the parties to these appeals; and further consideration might satisfy me that the objection by the appellants that the Assemblies of the Free Church and the United Free Church have released their ministers and office-bearers from adherence to the Westminster Confession, as such, has more weight than I am at present disposed to attach to it. On the other hand, the argument of the Dean of Faculty and Mr Haldane satisfied me that there are passages in the Westminster Confession and in other standards of the Church which might require such explanation and exposition as would fairly come within the words used in the Barrier Act, "alteration in doctrine." I do not feel myself competent, at anyrate upon the information at present before me, to express any final opinion upon such a point, and I do not therefore propose to base my judgment upon the second ground which was urged before us on behalf of the appellants.

It only remains to consider the position of the appellants and their rights as a minority of the ministers and elders of the Free Church representing congregations or portions of congregations who are not prepared to join the United Free Church. It is not contended that they have changed their principles; it is not suggested that they have departed from any fundamental or essential principle of the Free Church; it is not alleged that they are not faithfully carrying out the objects of the Protest of 18th May 1843. The respondents are threatening to attempt to eject them from their churches and manses, and to deprive them of any right to participate in any funds of the Church, simply on the ground that they decline to become members of the United Free Church. The decisions of the Court of Session in Craigie v. Marshall[1] and Couper v. Burn,[2] unless overruled by your Lordships' House, are wholly inconsistent, in my opinion, with any such right on the part of the respondents, and I am unable to support a judgment which would deprive the persons forming a minority of their rights simply upon the grounds that they are unwilling to become members of a body which has not only abandoned a fundamental principle of the Church to which they belong, but supports a principle essentially different from that on which that Church was founded.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

CLYDEBANK ENGINEERING AND SHIPBUILDING COMPANY, LIMITED (Defenders), Appellants.—Lawson Walton, K.C.—Ure, K.C.—Rufus Isaacs, K.C.—John H. Tait—Felix Cassel.

Contract—Penalty or Liquidate Damages.—By two contracts dated respectively in June and December 1896 the Spanish Government contracted with a Clyde shipbuilding firm for the building of four torpedo boat destroyers at the price under one contract of £67,180, and under the other of £65,650 for each vessel, delivery to be within periods varying from six and a half to seven and three quarter months from the date of the contract. The contracts provided that "The penalty for late delivery shall be at the rate of £500 per week for each vessel." At the date of the contracts the Spanish Government was endeavouring to suppress the insurrection in Cuba, and feared the armed intervention of the United States. All the vessels having been delivered many months after the stipulated dates of delivery the Spanish Government brought an action against the shipbuilders for £500 for each week of late delivery of each vessel. The defenders pleaded that the sum of £500 stipulated in the contracts was penalty, not liquidate damages.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the sum of £500 a week was to be regarded as liquidate damages and not as penalty, and that the Spanish Government were entitled to the full sum of £500 a week as damages.

Personal Objection—Waiver—Payment of price without reservation of claim of damages.—Circumstances in which held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that payment, without reservation, of the last instalment of the price of a ship and acceptance of delivery by the purchaser after the date stipulated for delivery did not import a waiver by the purchaser of his right under a clause in the contract entitling him to a specified sum as damages for late delivery.

The defenders, the Clydebank Engineering and Shipbuilding Company, Limited, and the Liquidators thereof, appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is a case in which a party to an agreement has admittedly broken it, and an action was brought for the purpose of enforcing the payment of a sum of money which, by the agreement between the parties, was fixed as that which the defenders were to pay in the event that has happened.

Two objections have been made to the enforcement of that payment. The first objection is one which appears upon the face of the instrument itself, namely, that it is a penalty, and not, therefore, recoverable as a pactional arrangement of the amount of damages resulting from the breach of contract. It cannot, I think, be denied—indeed, I think it has been frankly admitted by the learned counsel—that not much reliance can be placed upon the mere use of certain words. Both in England and in Scotland it has been pointed out that the Court must proceed according to what is the real nature of the transaction, and that the mere use of the word "penalty" on the one side or "damages" on the other, would not be conclusive as to the rights of the parties. It is, I think, not denied now that the law is the same both in England and in Scotland. The different form of its administration gave rise doubtless to the Act of William III.

(8 and 9 Will. III. c. 11), sec. 8, which, of course, is that upon which English lawyers rely when this question occurs; but that difference only arises from a difference in the mode of administering in this country the two branches of jurisprudence which we call law and equity, while the Scotch Judges had full jurisdiction in each of the Courts to administer justice, and in administering justice to administer it according to both branches of jurisprudence.

We come then to the question, What is the agreement here? and whether this sum of money is one which can be recovered as an agreed sum as damages, or whether, as has been contended, it is simply a penalty to be held over the other party in terrorem—whether it is, what I think gave the jurisdiction to the Courts in both countries to interfere at all in an agreement between the parties, unconscionable and extravagant, and one which no Court ought to allow to be enforced.

It is impossible to lay down any abstract rule as to what it may or may not be extravagant or unconscionable to insist upon without reference to the particular facts and circumstances which are established in the individual case. I suppose it would be possible in the most ordinary case, where people know what is the thing to be done and what is agreed to be paid, to say whether the amount was unconscionable or not. For instance, if you agreed to build a house in a year, and agreed that if you did not build the house for £50, you were to pay a million of money as a penalty, the extravagance of that would be at once apparent. Between such an extreme case as I have supposed and other cases, a great deal must depend upon the nature of the transaction—the thing to be done, the loss likely to accrue to the person who is endeavouring to enforce the performance of the contract, and so forth. It is not necessary to enter into a minute disquisition upon that subject, because the thing speaks for itself. But, on the other hand, it is quite certain, and an established principle in both countries, that the parties may agree beforehand to say, "Such and such a sum shall be damages if I break my agreement." The very reason why the parties do in fact agree to such a stipulation is that sometimes, although undoubtedly there is damage and undoubtedly damages ought to be recovered, the nature of the damage is such that proof of it is extremely complex, difficult, and expensive. If I wanted an example of what might or might not be said and done in controversies upon damages, unless the parties had agreed beforehand, I could not have a better example than that which the learned counsel has been entertaining us with for the last half-hour in respect of the damage resulting to the Spanish Government by the withholding of these vessels beyond the stipulated period. Supposing there was no such bargain, and supposing the Spanish Government had to prove damages in the ordinary way without insisting upon the stipulated amount of them, just imagine what would have to be the cross-examination of every person connected with the Spanish Administration such as is suggested by the commentaries of the learned counsel: "You have so many thousand miles of coast-line to defend by your torpedo-boat destroyers; what would four torpedo-boat destroyers do for that purpose? How could you say you are damaged by their non-delivery? How many filibustering expeditions could you have stopped by the use of four torpedo-boat destroyers?"

Nov. 17, 1904.

Clydebank Engineering and Shipbuilding Co., Limited, v. Don Jose Ramos Yzquierdo y Castaneda.

I need not pursue that topic. It is obvious on the face of it that the very thing intended to be provided against by this pactional amount of damages is to avoid that kind of minute and somewhat difficult and complex system of examination which would be necessary if you were to attempt to prove the damage. As I pointed out to the learned counsel during the course of his argument, in order to do that properly and to have any real effect upon any tribunal determining that question, one ought to have before one's mind the whole administration of the Spanish Navy—how they were going to use their torpedo-boat destroyers in one place rather than another, and what would be the relative speed of all the boats they possessed in relation to those which they were getting by this agreement. It would be absolutely idle and impossible to enter into a question of that sort unless you had some kind of agreement between the parties as to what was the real measure of damages which ought to be applied.

Then the other learned counsel suggests that you cannot have damages of this character, because really in the case of a warship it has no value at all. That is a strange and somewhat bold assertion. If it was an ordinary commercial vessel capable of being used for obtaining profits, I suppose there would not be very much difficulty in finding out what the ordinary use of a vessel of this size and capacity and so forth would be, what would be the hire of such a vessel, and what would therefore be the equivalent in money of not obtaining the use of that vessel according to the agreement during the period which had elapsed between the time of proper delivery and the time at which it was delivered in fact. But, says the learned counsel, you cannot apply that principle to the case of a warship, because a warship does not earn money. It is certainly a somewhat bold contention. I should have thought that the fact that a warship is a warship, her very existence as a warship capable of use for such and such a time would prove the fact of damage if the party was deprived of it, although the actual amount to be earned by it, and in that sense to be obtained by the payment of the price for it, might not be very easily ascertained—not so easily ascertained as if the vessel were used for commercial purposes and where its hire as a commercial vessel is ascertainable in money. But is that a reason for saying that you are not to have damages at all? It seems to me it is hopeless to make such a contention, and although that would not in itself be a very cogent argument, because the law might be so absurd, yet it would be a very startling proposition to say that you never could have agreed damages for the non-delivery of a ship of war although, under the very same words with exactly the same phraseology in the particular contract, you might have damages if it was a vessel used for commercial purposes; so that you would have to give a different construction to the very same words according to whether the thing agreed to be built was a warship or a ship intended for commercial purposes. I think it is only necessary to state the contention to shew that it is utterly unsound.

Then there comes another argument which, to my mind, is more startling still; the vessel was to be delivered at such and such a time; it was not delivered, but the fleet the Spanish Government had was sent out at such a time and the greater part of it was sunk, and, says the learned counsel, "If we had kept our contract and delivered these vessels they would have shared the fate of the other vessels belonging to the Spanish Government, and therefore in fact you have got your ships now, whereas if we had kept our contract they would have been at the bottom of the Atlantic." I confess, after some experience, I do not think I ever heard an argument of that sort before, and I do not think I shall often hear it again. Nothing could be more absurd than such a contention, which, if it were reduced to a compendious form such as one has in a marginal note, would certainly be a striking example of jurisprudence. I think I need say no more to shew how utterly absurd such a contention is. I pass on to the other question.

It seems to me, when one looks to see what was the nature of the transaction in this case, it is hopeless to contend that the parties only intended this as something in terrorem. Both parties recognised the fact of the importance of time; it is a case in which time is of the essence of the contract and so regarded by both parties, and the particular sum fixed upon as being the agreed amount of damages was suggested by the defendants themselves, and to say that that can be unconscionable or something which the parties ought not to insist upon, that it was a mere holding out something in terrorem, after looking at the correspondence between the parties, is, to my mind, not a very plausible suggestion. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the judgments of the Courts in Scotland are perfectly right in this respect, and I think there is no ground for the contention that this is not pactional damage agreed to between the parties—and for very excellent reason agreed to between the parties—at the time the contract was entered into.

Then there comes the further question as to waiver. That question, of course, assumes that these damages can be recovered, apart from the question of whether or not this vested right of action, which undoubtedly was a vested right of action, for the non-delivery of these boats within the limit of time, can be answered by saying that it has been released by waiver. I am not certain that I understand the application of the doctrine of waiver to such a question as we are now dealing with of the release of a right of action already vested; but, assuming we get over that difficulty, I do not feel as a matter of fact that there is any evidence upon which anybody could reasonably rely that there was an agreement assented to by both parties that these damages should be waived. The earlier part of this transaction and the correspondence between the parties I think is quite satisfactorily dealt with by the Lord Ordinary in his very lucid judgment, and it comes to this: that because for some time—I think I may say in aid of the defendants' argument some considerable time—this was not put forward or insisted upon, that, of itself, is to be absolute evidence of a waiver. I do not see it. I must say I never heard of a waiver, the issue upon which is undoubtedly upon the party who averred it, established by such a proposition. The mere fact of payment without deduction I think may be dealt with very shortly. Assuming a great desire to get these vessels, and assuming that the Spanish Government were in earnest—and I do not know why it can be suggested that they were not—to get these vessels with great urgency, it would to my mind have been a very extraordinary thing if they should have risked the delay which would have arisen from a controversy in respect of claims which the builders undoubtedly had, and if they had given, as it were, an excuse for the non-delivery of the ships by reason of those claims giving rise to the sort of argument which has lasted not a short time here, and which would have come up to this House long after the war between the American and the Spanish Governments had come to an end. Under those circumstances it appears to me a very natural thing that the claim was not insisted upon in the first instance; and with reference to the delay afterwards I cannot help having regard to the mode of Spanish administration; apart from any intention to waive, I can well imagine that for some time the question was allowed to hang over until the departments in London and in Madrid had ascertained their respective rights and the Spanish Government had made a claim. It is enough, however, to say that there is no evidence upon which any tribunal could reasonably act, even if there could be a waiver in point of law, as to which I venture to express considerable doubt; but, be that as it may, there is no evidence upon that, and I need not therefore express any opinion upon that subject.

I am entirely of opinion that the judgments of the Courts below are right, and I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion, and I can express the grounds upon which I have come to the same conclusion as my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in a very few words.

As to the first question, it is, as my noble and learned friend has pointed out, a question, not of words or of forms of speech, but of substance and of things, namely, whether a clause like the one in question provides for liquidate damages or for a penalty strictly so called in the sense of punishment irrespective of the damage sustained.

Now, it appears to me that a very useful rule for guiding the Court in this matter has been laid down for us in this House by Lord Watson and Lord Herschell, L.C., and the other noble and learned Lords who took part in the decision of the case of Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co.[1] In that case Lord Watson said this: "When a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage, the presumption is that the parties intended the sum to be penal, and subject to modification. The payments stipulated in article 12 are not of that character; they are made proportionate to the extent to which the respondent company may fail to implement their obligations, and they are to bear interest from the date of the failure. I can find neither principle nor authority for holding that payments so adjusted by the contracting parties with reference to the actual amount of damage ought to be regarded as penalties." Lord Herschell expressed himself in equally strong language when he said: "I know of no authority for holding that a payment agreed to be made under such conditions as these is to be regarded as a penalty only; and I see no sound reason or principle, or even convenience, for so holding."

I therefore conceive that it may be taken as an established principle in the law of Scotland that, if you find a sum of money made payable for the breach, not of an agreement generally, which might result in either a trifling or a serious breach, but a breach of one particular stipulation in an agreement, and when you find that the sum payable is proportioned to the amount, if I may so call it, or the rate of the non-performance of the agreement—for instance, if you find that it is so much per acre for ground which has been spoilt by mining operations, or if you find, as in the present case, that it is so much per week during the whole time for which the delivery of vessels beyond the contract time is delayed—then you infer that prima facie the parties intended the amount to be liquidate damages and not penalty. I say "prima facie" because it is always open to the parties to shew that the amount named in the clause is so exorbitant and extravagant that it could not possibly have been regarded as damages for any possible breach which was in the contemplation of the parties, and that is a reason for holding it to be a penalty and not liquidate damages notwithstanding the considerations to which I have alluded.

I confess I know of no other grounds—there may be grounds which may appear in future cases, but speaking from my present knowledge I am not aware of any other grounds—upon which a clause fixed under the conditions I have mentioned for breach of a particular stipulation in an agreement can be held to be a penalty and not liquidate damages. But in Forrest & Barr v. Henderson & Co.[1] the Lord President Inglis says this: "I hold it to be part of our law on this subject that, even where parties stipulate that a sum of this kind shall not be regarded as a penalty, but shall be taken as an estimate and ascertainment of the amount of damage to be sustained in a certain event, equity will interfere to prevent the claim being maintained to an exorbitant and unconscionable amount." My only criticism upon that sentence would be this—that I do not think that that is the right way of putting it. I think the fact of a claim being of an exorbitant or of an unconscionable amount as compared with any possible damages that could have been within the contemplation of the parties, is a reason for holding it not to be liquidate damages but a penalty. But that is only a difference of expression, and with the substance of the observation I entirely agree. But the Lord President adds this significant sentence: "But, of course, the question whether it is exorbitant or unconscionable is to be considered with reference to the point of time at which the stipulation is made between the parties." That is to say, you are to consider whether it is extravagant, exorbitant, or unconscionable (whatever word you like to select), at the time when the stipulation is made—that is to say, in regard to any possible amount of damages or any kind of damage which may be conceived to have been within the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract.

I hold it to be perfectly irrelevant and inadmissible for the purpose of shewing the clause to be extravagant, in the sense in which I use that word, to admit evidence, such as the learned counsel who has last addressed us has drawn our attention to, of the damages which were actually suffered by the Spanish Government. I agree that it was for the very purpose of excluding that kind of evidence that the parties determined to have the damages liquidate in this manner by naming a specific sum, and it appears to me that the learned counsel have been doing the very thing which the parties intended to prevent by the way in which they have framed their contract.

There is no evidence that this sum would be extravagant or unconscionable in the sense in which those words are used in the passage which I read from the Lord President's judgment in Forrest & Barr v. Henderson & Co.[1] I need not dwell upon that. I may, however, point out that the sum was suggested by the defenders themselves in their tender and was accepted by the Spanish Government, the other contracting party. I adopt, and it is unnecessary for me to repeat, the very lucid and clear terms in which that subject has been dealt with both by the Lord Ordinary and by the Inner-House.

Now, with regard to the other question, namely, as to the waiver of the right to this sum which the respondents have got judgment for, I can only say that no such waiver is proved to my satisfaction, nor indeed do I think there is more than the merest scintilla of evidence, if there be any at all, in favour of it.

What the appellants undertake to do is to prove the release of a vested right of action, and the way in which they attempt to do it is chiefly by drawing our attention to the fact that in March 1898, when the instalments were due on, I think, three of the vessels, the vessels having been delivered in the meantime, the Spanish Government paid the instalments without reserving any right to the liquidate damages. Of course the onus on this part of the case is upon the appellants. It may be that it would have been more prudent—it may even be that it would have been fairer—of the Spanish Government, in making the payment of the last instalments, to have reserved their right to make this claim; but it was not necessary for them to do so. There is no inconsistency between paying the instalments of the purchase-price and, after considering all the matters which were placed before them for their consideration by the defenders, making up their minds whether they would make this further claim or not. Indeed, they were almost bound to pay these instalments at once, because although it is quite true that, changing their minds, the shipbuilders had given delivery of the vessels, still as a matter of honour the Spanish Government were bound, and certainly the delivery was given in expectation that the payment would be made at an early date. I doubt whether it is even evidence of any intention to release this right of action in regard to these claims. It may very well be that the appellants thought, or rather hoped, that the matter was settled and that they would hear no more about it, but that of course would not amount to a release or waiver by the other party. The payments made in March 1898 were not a settlement, and they did not even purport to be a settlement, of all claims, because at the same time that the payments were made there were other claims which had been made and had to be settled for extras and other incidental expenses of that kind, so that there was not, and did not even purport to be, a settlement in March 1898. I see no grounds whatever for holding that there was any waiver of the claims which have been put forward in this action.

I adopt the very full and lucid language in which this part of the case has been dealt with in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, with whose observations I entirely agree.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I agree that these judgments ought to be affirmed.

This clause sought to be enforced is not a general penalty clause, but a specific agreement that sums of money, graduated according to time, shall be paid as penalties for delays in delivering these vessels. Now, the Court can only refuse to enforce performance of this pecuniary obligation if it appears that the payments specified were—I am using the language of Lord Kyllachy—"merely stipulated in terrorem, and could not possibly have formed" "a genuine pre-estimate of the creditor's probable or possible interest in the due performance of the principal obligation."

Now, all such agreements, whether the thing be called penalty or be called liquidate damage, are in intention and effect what Professor Bell calls "instruments of restraint," and in that sense penal. But the clear presence of this element does not in the least degree invalidate the stipulation. The question remains, Had the respondents no interest to protect by that clause, or was that interest palpably incommensurate with the sums agreed on? It seems to me that to put this question in the present instance is to answer it. Unless injury to a State is as matter of law inexpressible in money, Spain was or might be deeply interested in the early delivery of these ships and deeply injured by delay.

To my thinking, Lord Moncreiff has, in two sentences, admirably stated the case:—"The subject-matter of the contracts, and the purposes for which the torpedo-boat destroyers were required, make it extremely improbable that the Spanish Government ever intended or would have agreed that there should be inquiry into, and detailed proof of, damage resulting from delay in delivery. The loss sustained by a belligerent, or an intending belligerent, owing to a contractor's failure to furnish timeously warships or munitions of war, does not admit of precise proof or calculation; and it would be preposterous to expect that conflicting evidence of naval or military experts should be taken as to the probable effect on the suppression of the rebellion in Cuba or on the war with America of the defenders' delay in completing and delivering those torpedo-boat destroyers."

The appellants' counsel frankly maintained that the delay merely saved the Spanish Government so much expense, as vessels of war do not earn freight—an argument which would be equally applicable to the case of the vessels never being delivered at all, so that a total breach of the contract would be a positive good in itself. But, in truth, the only apparent difficulty in the present case arises from the magnitude and complexity of the interests involved and of the vicissitudes affecting them, and as the question is whether this stipulation of £500 a week is unconscionable or exorbitant, these considerations can hardly be considered a formidable difficulty in the way of the respondents.

On the question of waiver I must say I think the appellants' case completely fails; and this matter is very adequately dealt with by the Lord Ordinary.

Burgh—Magistrates—Powers—Ice-cream Vendor's Licence—Unauthorised Conditions—Ultra vires—"Lawful day"—Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. xxviii.), sec. 80.—By sec. 80 of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, as amended by sec. 57 of the Edinburgh Corporation Order Confirmation Act, 1901, it is enacted, that any person selling ice-cream (except in a duly licensed hotel) without a licence from the Magistrates, "who are hereby empowered to grant the same," for the house, building, or premises where such ice-cream is kept for sale or sold, shall be liable to a penalty, provided that such licence shall run from the date of issue until the 15th May ensuing, and upon renewal, from the date of expiry of the licence so renewed to the 15th May succeeding, "unless the same shall be sooner forfeited, revoked, or suspended," and that "every person licensed . . . to sell ice-cream under the provisions of the Act who shall . . . sell ice-cream except during the hours between" 8 A.M. and 11 P.M. "on any lawful day, or at such extended hour at night as the Magistrates may by special regulation, in particular cases and for reasons assigned, permit," shall be liable in a penalty. The statute did not provide a form of licence.

The Magistrates proposed that the licences to be issued by them to ice-cream vendors should contain the following conditions:—"1. That the said licencee shall not keep open said premises, or sell or permit the sale of ice-cream therein on Sunday, or on any other day set apart for public worship by lawful authority. 2. That the said licencee shall not keep open said premises, or sell or permit the sale of ice-cream therein before eight o'clock in the morning or after eleven o'clock at night. 3. That the said Magistrates, or any of them, may at any time suspend or revoke the licence."

In an action by an ice-cream vendor against the Magistrates for declarator that they were not entitled to issue, and that he was not bound to accept, a licence containing these conditions, in respect that the conditions were not authorised by the Act, held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that it was ultra vires of the Magistrates to insert the conditions in the licences issued by them.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question here may be reduced to a very short point, namely, whether the civic authorities have power to make these regulations which are complained of, because in substance they are regulations although they are contained in the form of a licence which they issue and which involves the power to make a regulation. Whether it is called a regulation or a bye-law it is a legislative power which, in my view, the Legislature has not confided to them.

It is idle to say that a great many of these things, as has been urged in the arguments which have been addressed to your Lordships, would be very desirable for the sake, it is said, of public order. I confess, for myself, I am wholly unable to understand what question of public order arises in the sale of ice-cream; but I pass that by, because I do not know what was the occasion of this legislation. We have had no opportunity of considering it; neither is there anything in the statute itself, nor has anything been put before us, to shew that which would have been undoubtedly a proper and legitimate source of information—what was the occasion and what was the evil aimed at to be remedied by the legislation which the Legislature has adopted. It is enough for me to say that I know nothing about it. I do not know what the evil aimed at was. I can give, therefore, no general view of what is the intention and purpose of the statute. I can only look at the statute itself and construe it, and when I construe the statute I find there is in the statute itself a plain prohibition with respect to certain things. The Magistrates, of course, are not only empowered but bound to give effect to legislation which has been passed; but when it is argued that because they are given the power to restrict, within certain hours, the sale of ice-cream, therefore they have implied power to do all that might be desirable or expedient with reference to the times and circumstances under which ice-cream shall be sold, it seems to me the argument entirely fails. What is sought to be done, whether directly by bye-laws, or indirectly by the language of the licence that is issued, is something that can only be done by the Legislature. It is a restraint of a common right which all His Majesty's subjects have—the right to open their shops and to sell what they please subject to legislative restriction—and, if there is no legislative restriction which is appropriate to the particular thing in dispute, it seems to me it would be a very serious inroad upon the liberty of the subject if it could be supposed that a mere single restriction which the Legislature has imposed could be enlarged and applied to things and circumstances other than that which the Legislature has contemplated.

The result is, as it appears to me, that the form of this licence is entirely irregular, and when it is said that any Court can construe it so as not to infringe the liberty of the subject, and that they would simply withdraw the licence under certain circumstances, I think in the first place that is an untenable proposition. You have no right to allow to stand that which on its face would involve an undue restriction of the liberty of the subject on the ground that any Court afterwards would construe it so that it should not do so, because it would be ultra vires on the face of it. I think that would be wrong in itself, but it would be much more wrong to allow the subject to be called upon to take such a question from Court to Court, and ultimately to your Lordships' House, because they would not interfere with the language which the civic authority had used which, upon the face of it, involved an infringement upon the liberty of the subject.

I confess for my own part I have entertained no doubt from the commencement of this case that this was ultra vires on the part of the civic authority. The only doubt I have entertained has been whether this was an appropriate form of remedy. I am told now—indeed, one of the learned Judges himself points out—that if the fact is, as was contended before him, that a form of licence involving, as I say, a prohibition of this sort was ultra vires, this is an appropriate form of remedy. Under those circumstances I can have no difficulty at all in advising your Lordships to allow this appeal, and to condemn the respondents in costs.

LORD DAVEY.—I certainly am not disposed to entertain the objection to the competency of this appeal, because looking at the judgments of the experienced Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House I do not see in any of the judgments delivered by those learned Judges, who, of course, must be assumed to know their own procedure, any objection to the competency of the action. Indeed, Lord Moncreiff says,—"If the pursuer had been able to shew that the Magistrates had exceeded their powers in this licence, he no doubt would have succeeded." I turn, therefore, to the substance of the argument of the learned counsel.

In the year 1900 the Town-Council or the Magistrates of Edinburgh thought fit to apply to the Legislature, and the Legislature passed an Act for the regulation of billiard-rooms and the sale of ice-cream. I must assume that there were circumstances connected with the trade of selling ice-cream in the city of Edinburgh which justified the intervention of the Legislature and made it right to impose special provisions on the sale of ice-cream which are not applicable to the sale of similar commodities. But, my Lords, every restriction and every regulation such as I find in the Act of 1900, repeated in the Provisional Order of 1901, is of course pro tanto a restraint upon the ordinary right of every British subject. It is in fact a restraint of trade, and I am of opinion that although the section of the Act and the Provisional Order in which I find such provisions ought to be construed fairly, and ought to be construed so as reasonably to effect the object which the Legislature must be presumed to have had in view, you ought not by implication to extend the restriction in restraint of that particular trade further than the Legislature has sanctioned, and still less ought you to give such a construction to clauses of that description as would impose a restraint, not only upon the exercise of the particular trade which is in question but also upon the exercise of other trades which are not in question.

Bearing that in mind, I confess I should have used the same words as the Lord Justice-Clerk used, though not in the same sense as that in which he used them. He says, "This is a very simple case"—and so far I agree with him; but I regret to say I cannot agree in the conclusion which he has come to; for I am of opinion that every one of the so-called conditions in the way of restricting the pursuer's trade goes beyond anything that is sanctioned by the Legislature in the Act or the Provisional Order. I need not read to your Lordships or refer at length to the section—it is the section of the Corporation Act of 1900 which is called clause 80, which re-enacts with some additions clauses 285-6 of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1879—but I will merely point out to your Lordships that it provides for a licence being granted for the premises in which ice-cream may be sold, and prohibits any unlicensed person from selling ice-cream except on premises so licensed. But the prohibition is merely to selling ice-cream upon those premises, and then the section imposes a penalty for that offence, and also for not writing or putting up upon his premises the words, "Licensed for the sale of ice-cream," and it provides that the licence shall run from the 15th day of May in one year to the 15th day of May following, "unless the same be sooner forfeited, revoked, or suspended." Then it prohibits the selling of ice-cream except during the hours between 8 o'clock in the morning and 11 o'clock at night "on any lawful day."

The first condition in the licence which I think is open to objection is that it not only prohibits the sale of ice-cream, but it also prohibits the licencee from keeping open his said premises for the sale of other goods. That I think is wholly unwarranted by the Act. There is nothing whatever there to prevent or prohibit the licencee's keeping open his premises during such hours as he may otherwise lawfully do so. The prohibition is against selling ice-cream, but there is no prohibition against keeping open his premises for other purposes. For example, I suppose it is quite possible that the sale of ice-cream may be combined with other branches of trade, and the effect of this proviso is to extend the prohibition as regards the hours and days when ice-cream may be sold to the sale of other commodities which may be lawfully sold on other days and at other times.

It is said that this is in the nature of a condition for giving effect to the provisions of the statute, but I am not prepared to say that you can do that. I am of opinion that you cannot under the guise of giving better effect to the provisions of a statute extend the statute to the prohibition or the restraint of trades which are not included in the statute. Although I quite feel the force of the argument used by Lord Trayner on this part of the case, the answer really is that which has been given by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack—that it might have been a very reasonable provision for the Legislature to have prescribed and inserted in the statute, but the Legislature has not done so.

Then, the words in the statute are "on any lawful day," which I agree are ambiguous. The Town-Council have construed those words to mean on any day except Sunday or any other day set apart for public worship by lawful authority. Now, my Lords, Sunday no doubt is properly excluded, but as regards the further words, "or on any other day set apart for public worship by lawful authority," I do not know what is meant by "lawful authority." If it means that the Government or any other authority acting under the powers of an Act of Parliament prohibits the sale of ice-cream upon a certain day the prohibition will have effect; but if it does not do so I do not, I confess, agree that because a day other than Sunday is fixed for public worship by some authority it extends the restriction to such a day. That consideration derives still more force when it is considered that the prohibition is not only against the selling of ice-cream, but against the licencee keeping open his premises for other purposes.

The same observation applies to No. 2; and then we come to No. 3, which is: "That the magistrates, or any of them, may at any time suspend or revoke this licence." Now, I confess that I have not heard from the learned counsel, and I took the liberty of pressing the learned counsel on this point, of any power in the magistrates either to revoke or to suspend this licence. It is said that the words which I have read, "unless the same be sooner forfeited, revoked, or suspended," give the power. That construction of the Act of Parliament seems to me to be entirely contrary to principle. The utmost that you can say is that the words seem to assume that the corporation either have already, or may at some future time, acquire a power to forfeit, revoke, or suspend the licence. That it does not give the power seems to me plain from a consideration of the words, because the words are, as your Lordships will observe, "forfeited, revoked, or suspended." Now, "forfeited" has a clear and definite meaning when you are speaking of licences of this description. It means that if the licencee does or omits certain acts his licence will be forfeited. That is the plain meaning of it. Well, my Lords, you will look in vain in this statute or in this Provisional Order for anything that defines the conditions upon which the licence is to become forfeited. It is plain, then, that this clause does not make any provision for the licencee forfeiting his licence, and it is equally plain to my mind that it does not contain any power either to revoke or suspend the licence. I therefore agree with the motion which has been made by your Lordship that the interlocutors be reversed.

Rossi v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I am of the same opinion.

The first question is whether the proposed form of licence does or does not accurately state the restrictions imposed by the statute on dealers in ice-cream. It seems to me that it does not, and that it purports to impose on the dealers more restrictions than does the statute. I can find no warrant in the statute for forcing the dealer to close his premises at the hours during which he is forbidden to sell ice-cream, and I know of no principle upon which the Magistrates can be held entitled to eke out what they may consider a weak prohibition by imposing an additional one. The licence would compel a man who had a general baking or confectionery business to shut shop at the specified hours, merely because one (and it might be an unimportant) item of his business was ice-cream. If the Legislature should in the future come to estimate the importance of ice-cream higher than it seems to do at present, it may adopt the stringent measure proposed. But in the meantime the respondents must be content to keep pace with the Legislature.

I further think that the respondents, in the third condition, arrogate to the Magistrates a power not conferred on them.

As regards lawful days, I think Sundays are not, in the sense of the Act, lawful days, on the principle stated in this House in the case of Phillips v. Innes.[1] As regards the other days described in the proposed licence, I do not feel called on to discuss dubious questions about public fasts which have little or no practical importance, and shall only remark that it is quite out of place for a licensing body to put into the licence their gloss on the statute on such points, whether it be more or less probably correct. On the present point the respondents, I have no doubt with the best intentions, have gone out of their way to court discussion.

The next question is as to the form of action. Now, the substance of the matter is that the Magistrates have publicly threatened to impose and enforce on a lawful trade restrictions which are illegal. This being so, it would be unfortunate if it were necessary that a lawful trade should be interrupted and harassed by actual prosecution. It seems to me that the action of declarator, which is peculiar to the Scotch system, exactly meets the case. It is quite a mistake to assume that this trader requires to postulate what he has not got, namely, a licence, in order to find himself a title to sue. His title is his trade, which the respondents avow that they intend to interfere with by refusing to give a trader a licence except upon terms more onerous than the law allows. In my opinion the appellant has a perfectly good title to have those restrictions declared illegal.

[1] 2 Sh. and M'L. 465, 6 Sco. R. R. 647.

"ORDERED that the interlocutors appealed from be reversed: And declared that the Magistrates are not empowered to grant licences to ice-cream vendors for premises in the city of Edinburgh for the keeping for sale, or sale, of ice-cream, subject to any conditions or restrictions other than those specified in sec. 80 of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, as amended by the Edinburgh Corporation Order Confirmation Act, 1901, or in accordance therewith: And that the licence set out in condescendence 9 is not conform to the said statutes: That the cause be remitted to the Court of Session: And that the respondents do pay to the appellant the costs in the Court of Session and in respect of this appeal."

(IN the Court of Session, Jan. 15, 1904, 6 F. 285.)

Alexander Dick Grimond, merchant and manufacturer in Dundee, died on 29th January 1903, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th November 1894, by which he, inter alia, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estates into three equal parts. With regard to one of these parts he provided as follows:—"And with regard to one of the said parts or shares they shall divide, pay, and convey the same to and among such charitable or religious institutions and societies as I may direct, and in such proportions to each or any as I may fix by any writing, whether holograph or tested, or under my hand, and failing thereof in whole or in part, then as regards such whole or such part not disposed of by me, to and among such charitable or religious institutions and societies as my trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, may select, and in such proportions to each or any as they may fix."

Mr Grimond did not leave any writing in regard to the institutions and societies which he desired to benefit.

In April 1903 Mrs Margaret Isabella Grimond or Macintyre and another, being two of Mr Grimond's next of kin, brought an action against his trustees concluding for declarator that the above quoted direction in regard to one-third of the residue of his estates was void and ineffectual on the ground of vagueness and uncertainty, and that that share of residue fell into intestacy.

The defenders pleaded that the direction regarding the one-third share of residue in question being valid and effectual, they should be assoilzied.

On 31st October 1903 the Lord Ordinary (Low) assoilzied the defenders.

On 15th January 1904 the Second Division (Lord Moncreiff dissenting) adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The pursuers appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I do not think it is necessary to go through the course of the authorities. I think this question may be decided upon a very simple proposition. In my opinion the testator here has not given a class from which he allowed his trustees to select individually, but he has left his directions so vague that it is in effect giving some one else power to make a will for him instead of making a will for himself, which I conceive to be the objection always entertained where the directions are so extremely vague that you cannot say what it is that the testator meant. In this case the testator has not made any will himself; he has allowed some one else to make a will for him after his death, and that the law will not allow.

I confess I have not been able to entertain much doubt from the commencement of this argument that that is the condition of this will, and I think I am encouraged in the expression of that opinion by finding some variety of opinion among the learned Judges themselves, who nevertheless adhered to the decision of the Lord Ordinary. The Lord Ordinary says it is to be confined to religious societies in the sense of those that are Christian. I do not find that that view is adopted by any of the learned Judges on appeal, and what the particular limit is within which the persons designated, the trustees, are to select I am afraid I have not been able to discover.

It seems to me that the judgment of Lord Moncreiff really disposes of the question quite satisfactorily. I do not wish to add anything to his Lordship's view. It appears to me that he has satisfactorily answered the whole argument which has now been presented by the respondents. In the result I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and a proper interlocutor made for the purpose of giving effect to the judgment prayed by the pursuers.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I concur.

LORD JAMES.—I concur, for the reasons which have been given by Lord Moncreiff in his judgment.

LORD ROBERTSON.—So do I.

(IN the Court of Session, Dec. 4, 1902, 5 F. 191.)

Lord Macnaghten. Lord Davey. Ld. Robertson. Lord Lindley.

Captain Edward Dunbar and Miss Phœbe Dunbar, heiress of entail in possession of Sea Park, were married on 17th October 1848, having executed an antenuptial contract dated 13th October 1848.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Captain Dunbar Dunbar on 10th January 1898, and Mrs Dunbar Dunbar died on 9th May 1899, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. The only child of the marriage, who attained the age of twenty-one and survived his parents, was the Reverend John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar. He had the sole interest as fiar in the marriage-contract funds and estate.

Questions having arisen (1) as to what estate in the possession of Mrs Dunbar Dunbar at the time of her death fell under a conveyance of the wife's acquirenda in the marriage-contract, and (2) whether the son, who had taken his provisions under the marriage-contract, was entitled to legitim from his mother's moveable estate, a multiplepoinding was raised in 1900 by her son, as real raiser, in the name of her testamentary trustees as nominal raisers.

Dunbar v. Dunbar.

The fund in medio was the wife's estate, heritable and moveable, in the hands of her testamentary trustees.

The judicial factor on the marriage-contract trust claimed the whole fund in medio, but subsequently only insisted in his claim to the extent of that part thereof which formed the estate of Mrs Dunbar Dunbar at the dissolution of her marriage. He maintained that the wife's savings from income, and property purchased therewith, were conquest falling under the marriage-contract. He pleaded that on a sound construction of the marriage-contract he was entitled to be preferred in terms of his claim.

The Reverend J. A. Dunbar Dunbar claimed one-half of the residue of the fund in medio, so far as the same was moveable, after satisfying the claims of the judicial factor, and pleaded, "In respect of his right of legitim the claimant is entitled to be preferred in terms of his claim."

The trustees under Mrs Dunbar Dunbar's settlement claimed the whole fund in medio, maintaining that no part of it fell within the conveyance to the marriage-contract trustees, and that the son's claim to legitim was excluded by the express terms of the marriage-contract.

The questions so raised depended on the following clauses in the marriage-contract :—"I, the said Miss Phœbe Dunbar, further in contemplation of the said intended marriage, do hereby dispone, assign, and convey to" the trustees "all and sundry lands and estate, heritable bonds, adjudications, and all other heritable subjects, of whatever kind or denomination, or wherever situated, presently pertaining to and belonging to me, or which I may acquire or succeed to during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, but excepting and reserving herefrom the foresaid estate of Sea Park, already settled under strict entail as aforesaid."—[Here followed special conveyances of the rents of Sea Park and various funds.] "And further, I, the said Miss Phœbe Dunbar, with consent of my said promised husband, and I, the said Edward Dunbar, Esquire, for myself, and we both with one consent, hereby bind and oblige ourselves to dispone, assign, convey, transfer, and make and set over to, and in favour of the said trustees and foresaids, All and Sundry lands heritages, and sums of money, funds, goods, and other estate, real and personal, which I, the said Miss Phœbe Dunbar, now have or at any time hereafter may conquest and acquire by purchase, succession, or otherwise, other than the heritages to be acquired and settled by the trustees and executors of the said John Dunbar, Esquire, as aforesaid, upon trust, in the terms and for the general purposes (that is, apart from the particular settlements of the furniture and others in the mansion-house of Sea Park, and of the fund forming part of the residue of the estate of the said John Dunbar, Esquire) of the said intended marriage, and of this settlement as after written . . . to pay to me, the said Miss Phœbe Dunbar, or to permit and empower me to receive the whole of the foresaid rents, interest, profits, and dividends, and whole annual income of the said estates, properties, moneys, or stocks, funds, and securities wherever secured or invested during all the days of my life for my own separate benefit and use, exclusive of the jus mariti and administration of my said promised husband or of any future husband, as aforesaid."

The provisions made in favour of the child or children of the marriage were declared to be "in full satisfaction to him, her, and them of all bairns' part of gear, executry, and everything else which they could respectively claim or demand by and through the decease of me, the said Miss Phœbe Dunbar, their mother, on any ground whatever."

By a minute of admissions lodged in process by the parties, it was admitted that the whole estate left by Mrs Dunbar Dunbar at her death (with certain exceptions immaterial to the questions now reported) was to be held to have been made from accumulations of income to which Mrs Dunbar Dunbar was entitled.

Thereafter, on 19th November 1901, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, finds (1) that the provision of conquest does not extend to the funds and estate vested in the testamentary trustees of the late Mrs Dunbar Dunbar, which consisted of or were derived from the accumulation of income to which Mrs Dunbar Dunbar was entitled; (2) that said provision of conquest does not extend to accumulations after the dissolution of the marriage or to estate acquired after the dissolution of the marriage: . . . Repels the plea in law for the judicial factor, and for the Reverend John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar: . . . Appoints the cause to be enrolled for application of these findings."

The judicial factor and the Reverend J. A. Dunbar Dunbar reclaimed.

On 4th December 1902 the First Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The judicial factor, Sir F. C. Mackenzie, and the Rev. J. A. Dunbar Dunbar appealed.

Lord Macnaghten.—The questions involved in this appeal depend upon the terms of an antenuptial contract, dated 13th October 1848, made in contemplation of a marriage then intended, and shortly afterwards solemnised, between Captain Edward Dunbar and Miss Phœbe Dunbar of Sea Park. Miss Phœbe Dunbar was heiress in possession of the entailed estate of Sea Park, and a lady of considerable means besides. The settlement effected by the contract was a settlement of property which belonged to her at the time, but it also contained a clause of conquest and acquirenda. Mrs Dunbar, who survived her husband, is now dead. In addition to the fortune which was hers at the date of the marriage, she became entitled to a life interest in a large sum of money under the will of a brother, who died in 1862. At her death she was possessed of personal estate of the value of more than £100,000, made up of savings or accumulations of income derived from her life interest under her brother's will and the interest of the funds specifically comprised in her marriage-settlement. By her will she left the moneys which she had thus accumulated away from the appellant, the Rev. John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar, who was the only surviving child of the marriage, but apparently, in her opinion, amply provided for otherwise.

It was contended on behalf of Mr John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar that these accumulations of income, as and when laid out on investments of a permanent character, or, at anyrate, as from Mrs Dunbar's death, became by virtue of the clause of conquest and acquirenda subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1848, and that consequently it was not competent for Mrs Dunbar to deal with them by will. That was the principal claim advanced on behalf of the appellant. There was also a claim to a property called the Glen of Rothes, and there was a claim to legitim under the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881. On these three questions and on some minor points, which were not raised at your Lordships' Bar, the learned Judges in Scotland unanimously rejected the appellant's claim. Agreeing as I do in the result at which they have arrived, I will not trouble your Lordships by dealing with the case at any length.

As regards clauses in marriage-contracts providing for the settlement of after-acquired property, I quite agree that effect must be given to the intention of the parties apparent on the face of the contract construed fairly, although the result may seem to be whimsical or even unreasonable. But still there are some considerations which it is as well to bear in mind as aids to the construction of such clauses. These considerations may of course be excluded either designedly or accidentally by the language used, but unless they are so excluded they are, I think, of general, if not universal, application. One is that change of investment—mere alteration in the outward form of property—is not "acquisition" within the meaning of a provision of this sort. Another is that property which has reached its destination through the medium of the trust, or property which, in accordance with the declarations of the parties to the contract, comes to be at the absolute disposal of one of those parties, does not again fall under the operation of the trust unless there is a clear direction to that effect. In the present case I cannot find in the marriage-contract of 1848 any indication that money, which under or in accordance with the trust would come to the hands of Mrs Dunbar—money which was to be hers to hoard or spend, to waste or save, just as she pleased—was under any circumstances or in any event to be brought back under the operation of the trust and pass through the mill again. Such a result seems inconsistent with provisions carefully made to safeguard her separate use and enjoyment of the income which was originally her own. It is, I think, opposed to the whole scope of the instrument.

The clause in question is called a clause of conquest, and the word "conquest" occurs in it. But the word is used as a verb, and not as a substantive. So used, it has not apparently the strict technical meaning to be ascribed to it when used as a substantive. A clause of conquest, though perhaps a somewhat rude and rough form of provision for the issue of the marriage, is intelligible enough when the husband is the settlor; but according to the view expressed in this House in the case of Diggens v. Gordon[1] it is not, or at anyrate was not at the date of the contract now in question, properly speaking, applicable where the settlement is by the lady. In the case of a settlement on the part of the wife, the word "conquest" adds little or nothing to the force of the word "acquire" when used in conjunction with it. Here, I think, the word "acquire" is the governing word. The expression "conquest" is, as it seems to me, merely redundant and tautological.

An argument was founded on the expression "acquire by purchase." But there, again, I think that the words "by purchase, succession, or otherwise" add nothing to the force of the word "acquire," and that, whatever the meaning of the draftsman may have been, there must have been an "acquisition" properly so called in order to bring any subject within the operation of the clause. There must be something got from an external source.

As regards the lands of the Glen of Rothes and the question of legitim, I have nothing to add to the observations of the learned Judges in the Court below.

It only remains for me to move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD DAVEY.—The first and principal question on this appeal is whether certain investments of the savings made by the late Mrs Dunbar Dunbar from her separate income are bound by a clause of acquirenda in her marriage-contract. She was entitled to the income partly under the marriage-contract itself and partly under the will of her brother, who died during the subsistence of the marriage.

The marriage-contract is dated 13th October 1848, and after a conveyance by the lady of certain specified subjects, it contains a clause whereby Mrs Dunbar Dunbar, with the consent of her intended husband, and Captain Dunbar Dunbar for himself, obliged themselves to dispone, assign, convey, &c. to the trustees all real and personal estate which the lady then had or at any time thereafter might "conquest and acquire by purchase, succession, or otherwise." The first trust of the settled property other than the furniture, plate, and so forth in the mansion-house of Sea Park was to pay the annual income to the lady for her life for her separate use, exclusive of the jus mariti of her intended husband or any future husband.

Captain Dunbar Dunbar died on 10th January 1898, and Mrs Dunbar Dunbar died on 9th May 1899, leaving a son, the Rev. Archibald Dunbar Dunbar, the only issue of the marriage surviving.

It has been decided in Scotland that a life interest in income is prima facie not comprised in a clause of acquirenda: Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd.[1] And the same has been held in England: Briggs v. White;[2] or if it is expressly included, it follows the destination of the trust income: Scholfield v. Spooner.[3]

I was, I confess, rather surprised to hear it argued that, apart from any technical meaning to be attached to the word "conquest," the savings from a wife's separate income became subject to an ordinary acquirenda clause or covenant for settlement of after-acquired property. This proposition was said to be supported by Lord Eldon's opinion in Lewis v. Madocks[4] and the recent case of In re Bendy.[5] When Lewis v. Madocks[4] is examined, I do not think it can be cited as an authority for that purpose. There was a covenant by a husband to convey by deed or will all his personal estate to the use of himself and his intended wife, and the survivor, subject to the payment of a sum of money on the death of the survivor to the children of the marriage. Lord Eldon said during the argument that he could not adopt the construction that annual produce was properly acquired in the sense of the bond, but he added, except only to the extent "in which the husband himself might think proper to lay up that produce as capital"; and in the course of his judgment he said that certain sums must be considered as "personal estate," "capital, even if composed of savings."

The point, however, does not appear to have been necessary for the actual decision, and the case was a very special one. The weight of it as an authority is considerably diminished by Lord Eldon's remark when the case first came before him, in 8 Ves. at p. 156, that if the Court finds a solid subject of personal property they would attach it rather than render the covenant perfectly nugatory, though they did not know what to do with the argument shewing the absurdity of it. I entirely agree with the very clear and convincing judgment of Romer, L. J., in Finlay v. Darling,[1] and hold with him that savings from income not expressly included in a covenant for settlement of after-acquired property do not fall within the covenant, and the wife retains the control and power of disposing of such income. Romer, L. J.'s, opinion is supported by that of Buckley, J., in the recent case of Clutterbuck's Settlement.[2] The same point arose in Scotland in Young's Trustees v. Young;[3] but it was held to be not proved that the investments in question were made out of savings of the wife's income. There was, therefore, no decision. But it seems to have been assumed by some of the learned Judges that if it had been proved, the investments would have been outside the clause of acquirenda.

The point, therefore, is narrowed to the question whether the word "conquest" in the deed is used in a technical sense, and what is the effect if that be so. On this question the decision in the case of Diggens v. Gordon,[4] which was affirmed in this House, appears to me important. "The word 'conquest' used substantively," says Professor Bell, "comprehends whatever is acquired, whether heritable or moveable, during the marriage by industry, economy, purchase, or donation," and it may be assumed to bear an analogous, but perhaps more elastic, meaning when used as a verb. Properly speaking, conquest is applicable only to the husband, and cannot in any legitimate sense be applied to the wife, as explained by the Lord Justice-Clerk in Diggens v. Gordon.[4] This does not carry you very far, because it may yet be a technical word improperly applied, as distinguished from a word used in a non-technical sense. What is more important is that in a proper provision of conquest the title of the husband is not affected during the subsistence of the marriage or during his own life after its dissolution. He remains the unlimited fiar of his property, except that he cannot defeat the provision by a gratuitous disposition in fraud of his contract. In the marriage-contract now under consideration, on the contrary, the property is to be at once, on the accruer of the wife's title, conveyed to the trustees of the settlement, and to be placed in their management for the purposes of the settlement. In the judgments of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Cowan in the Court of Session, and of Lord Cranworth and Lord Colonsay in this House in Diggens v. Gordon,[4] this circumstance was treated as conclusive that the word was not used in any technical sense. I see no valid reason for not adopting those opinions in the present case.

In Diggens v. Gordon[1] the question was whether property which the wife took by succession during her coverture was bound by the clause. The words were "conquest or acquire," which certainly lent themselves to a distributive construction more easily than the words before your Lordships. It might have been said that the lady "acquired the property if she did not conquest it." That may be true. But it appears to me from a perusal of the judgments in the Court of Session and in this House that the decision was, in fact, based on the ground that the word conquest was not used in any technical sense, and it is a decision to that effect.

The appellants also placed reliance on the use of the word "purchase" in the clause under consideration, which they contended was meaningless if it was not intended to include property purchased by Mrs Dunbar Dunbar out of her income. Your Lordships were told that this word is found in the common form provision of conquest from which this clause was adapted by the draftsman. But what I wish to point out is that the word "purchase" is equally destitute of any real meaning in a proper provision of conquest. If the moneys laid out in the purchase were not already subject to the clause, the purchased property will not become so; and inversely the investment of moneys which are not the subject of conquest will not make them so. If a man has an estate before marriage and sells it during the coverture and buys another, or if he invests money coming to him from a succession in Consols, the new estate or the Consols will not (I presume) become "conquest"; and, on the other hand, if he accumulates his savings in a money-box or a bank, or in any of the traditional modes, the fund is (I presume) equally "conquest at the time of his death," though he has not laid it out in an investment. I am content to say with the Lord Ordinary that it is difficult to find any satisfactory meaning for this word, but I am unable to hold that it adds anything to the argument that savings from income were included in the provision under consideration.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal fails on the first and principal point. The only other points argued by the appellants at your Lordships' bar were:—(1) as to the lands of Glen of Rothes, and (2) as to the Rev. Archibald Dunbar Dunbar's claim to legitim out of his late mother's estate. On the former I agree with the Lord President that there was sufficient consideration to support the agreement made between Mrs Dunbar Dunbar and her son as a family arrangement. In such cases the Court does not weigh the amount of consideration in golden scales, and there being no claim for reduction of the agreement, the Court is bound to give effect to it. I also agree with the Lord President that the claim for legitim is excluded by clause 7 of the marriage-contract, notwithstanding that the claim can only be made under the Act of 1881. The words of the clause are perfectly general, and are, I think, intended to exclude every claim which the children of the marriage might otherwise make through the death of their mother at the time when that event happened.

I am of opinion that the appeal fails altogether, and should be dismissed with costs.

Dunbar
v.
Dunbar.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I have grave doubts of the judgment under review. But the Court below was a very strong one, each of the learned Judges being singularly well equipped in this region of the law of Scotland. Accordingly, I do not dissent from the motion that the appeal be dismissed.

LORD LINDLEY.—In 1848, upon the marriage of Captain Dunbar and Miss Phœbe Dunbar, property of hers, and land which she might afterwards acquire, was vested in trustees upon certain trusts, which included a trust for her sole and separate use for her life; and by the settlement it was provided that all the property, real or personal, which she then had or should at any time thereafter "conquest and acquire by purchase, succession, or otherwise" (with a specified exception) should be conveyed or assigned to the trustees of the settlement, to be held by them on the trusts therein declared. The husband died in January 1898, and his wife died in the following year. The main question before your Lordships is whether property purchased by the wife with income paid to her during her marriage, and to which she was entitled for her separate use, became on her death subject to the dispositions of her will, or whether it became vested in the trustees of the settlement for the benefit of a child of the marriage. The Court of Session has decided this question in favour of the persons claiming under her will, and against the trustees of the settlement.

Any other decision appears to me entirely inconsistent with the trust for the separate use of the wife during her life. By virtue of this trust the income which became payable to her became her own property absolutely, and the trustees had no claim to it as against her. She was at perfect liberty to spend that income if she chose, or to save it and invest it in Government or other stocks or securities, or in the purchase of land. As long as she retained it, or any investment or property bought with it, she could dispose of it, or what was bought with it, as she thought proper by act inter vivos, or by will.

The conveyance of after-acquired land did not comprise land bought by her with the income to which she was entitled for life for her separate use under that settlement. The subsequent provision for settling after-acquired property must, in my opinion, be construed in like manner so as to preserve her rights under the trust for her separate use, and not so as to destroy those rights or any of them. Wide as the provision is, it cannot possibly include the income which it is the duty of the trustees to pay over to her; and why, if that is so, they should be able to follow the income and claim what she may have purchased with it passes my comprehension. As a matter of principle I concur entirely with the view taken by Romer, L. J., in Finlay v. Darling,[1] in which a similar point arose on an English settlement.

But the law of Scotland may, of course, be different; and it was strenuously contended by counsel for the appellants that the use of the word conquest (which has a technical meaning in Scottish law) shewed that property bought by the lady out of her savings, and held by her at her death, could not be disposed of by her by her will, but became subject to the trusts of the settlement, and counsel cited a number of Scotch decisions in support of that contention.

The word conquest in this settlement has to be applied to the property of the wife and to property which, under the settlement, belonged to her for her separate use. Moreover, the word conquest does not occur alone; the phrase is, "conquest and acquire by purchase, succession, or otherwise." The whole phrase includes every mode of acquisition, and points to some future acquisition by which her property was increased before it became subject to the trusts of the settlement; in other words, the phrase points to some property in addition to that to which the lady was entitled at the date of the settlement, and in addition to any property to which she was entitled under the settlement itself. Any other construction deprives her of the right to dispose of her own property under the trust for her separate use. If any confirmation of this view is required, it is, I think, to be found in the clause in the settlement by which Captain Dunbar renounced all claims to property which his wife might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, whether or not such acquisitions were settled on the trusts of the settlement. This points to the possibility of her acquiring property which was not to be brought into settlement, and would include such as she might purchase with her own separate income. But I do not myself attach importance to this clause.

As regards the Scotch decisions, I can discover no case in which it has been held that property purchased by a wife with money belonging to her for her separate use under her marriage-settlement falls within a clause in it binding her to bring her after-acquired property into the same settlement. The nearest authority on the point is Young's Trustees v. Young,[1] and that somewhat supports the opposite view; but it cannot be regarded as a decision in favour of the respondents. In the absence of any authority settling the question in favour of the appellants, and thinking that their contention is wrong on principle, I have come to the conclusion that their appeal on the main point ought to be dismissed.

As regards the Glen of Rothes property, I also have arrived at the conclusion that the appellants are wrong. This property was acquired by the wife in exchange for part of the Sea Park property which belonged to her and her son, and was expressly excluded from the settlement. The exchange was the result of a family arrangement to which her son was a party, and in my opinion the terms of this arrangement were such as to exclude any claim by the son to this Glen of Rothes property.

There remains the claim of the son to legitim, i.e., half of his mother's unsettled personal property. His claim is based upon the fact that he acquired this right under a statute passed after the settlement was made, namely, 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21. But the settlement contains a clause to the effect that the provision made by it for the children of the marriage shall be in full satisfaction of all "bairns' part of gear, executry, and everything else which they could respectively claim or demand by and through the decease of their mother on any ground whatever." These words are so wide as, in my opinion, to exclude the children of the marriage from all claims foreseen and unforeseen to any share of their mother's personalty except under the settlement.

In my opinion the decision appealed from was correct on all points, and the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

No contract was completed, and the principal raised an action of damages against his agent for the profit he would have gained if the contract had been completed.

The defenders appealed.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Davey. Ld. Robertson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The proposition of law laid down by the Exchequer Chambers in Collen v. Wright,[1] must, I think, notwithstanding the protest made by Cockburn, C. J., be held to be law. But one must see what that proposition is, and how far it is applicable to the case before your Lordships. The proposition is this—that a person who induces another to contract with him as the agent of a third party by an unqualified assertion of his being authorised to act as such agent is answerable to the person who so contracts for any damage which he may sustain by reason of the assertion of authority being untrue. This is the authority upon which the Court below have given damages, but it really has no application to the facts in proof here.

A firm applies to a shipbroker in Scotland to obtain freights for a vessel of theirs. The shipbroker, in consequence, opens a negotiation with Messrs Ireland, who state certain terms which they will accept, one of which is what the appellants' principals will not agree to. The appellants nevertheless untruly report that the bargain is complete, whereas the bargain, in fact, went off altogether. Now, I quite agree that, if in consequence of their misstatement the respondents changed their position and suffered damage, the appellants would be liable for any actual damage arising from the acting on that erroneous statement, and it is no answer to say that the appellants bona fide expected to get over the one outstanding term by which the bargain went off: but it appears to me there is an absolute failure to make out any such damages as are claimed, though I think £33 odd has been justly suggested as enough to cover all actual damage sustained, and for that the respondents ought to sustain their judgment.

But I think that the respondents in applying the doctrine of Collen v. Wright,[1] and treating the appellants as having held themselves out as the agents of Messrs Ireland, and clothed with their authority to make a contract, are seeking to get, and the Court below have given them as damages, the profits they would have made if Messrs Ireland had in fact authorised the appellants to act as their agents, and had in truth made that bargain. But, in fact, they did nothing of the sort; they were endeavouring to get a bargain from Messrs Ireland, and having failed to overcome Messrs Ireland's objections, they are in the position of not having got the bargain they represented they had.

There is no evidence of any loss sustained by reason of relying on the untrue statement, and I think the original judgment cannot be supported.

I therefore move that the judgment be reduced to £33 odd, and the appellants ought to get the costs of this appeal.

Lord Davey.—It is not necessary for the purpose of this decision to have recourse to the doctrine of Collen v. Wright.[1] The appellants, the shipbrokers, were undoubtedly agents of the respondents for the purpose of finding a charter for their ship. But I am not satisfied on the evidence that the appellants were employed by Messrs Ireland & Son to find a ship for their requirements. It appears to me that the negotiations were carried on between the appellants as agents for the respondents with Irelands as principals acting on their own behalf. No doubt the appellants were intermediaries between the two firms, but that always is so where the agent of one party is negotiating with the other party. Wherever a person misrepresents a fact relative to a third party, he, in a sense, impliedly represents that he is authorised to make the statement. But I do not think that he is thereby asserting that he is clothed with an authority or fills a particular character within the meaning of the doctrine of Collen v. Wright[1] as explained in subsequent cases, including the recent case of Starkey v. Bank of England[2] in this House, or that the doctrine ought to be extended to such a case as that now before your Lordships.

But the appellants were guilty of a breach of their duty to the respondents, their principals, in giving them incorrect information as to their business, and are liable in damages for such a breach of duty. The measure of damages in such a case has recently been discussed in the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Cassaboglou v. Gibbs.[3] It was there determined that the measure of damages was the loss actually sustained by the principal in consequence of the misrepresentation, and that it did not include the anticipated profit which he might have made if the representation had been true. I am of opinion that the proper measure of damages in the present case is the same as in the case I have referred to. There is no evidence that the respondents lost any opportunity of profitably employing their ship owing to their belief that a charter had been arranged with Ireland & Son, and I am of opinion than they cannot, therefore, recover anything in respect of the profits which they might have derived if their relief had been well founded. With regard to the expenses of the abortive action against Ireland & Son, the question is whether they were reasonably incurred. On this point the letters which passed between the respondents' solicitors and the appellants on 27th and 28th February and 1st March are important, and I think the respondents are entitled to recover these expenses subject to taxation. The only other head of damage claimed is a general charge for telegrams and trouble and inconvenience. I think the sum of £33, 1s. 3d. which has been awarded by the Court below will be an ample compensation and solatium to the respondents on this head.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be varied by the substitution of the sum of £33, 1s. 3d. for the sum of £450, and quoad ultra it should be affirmed; and that the respondents should pay the costs of this appeal.

LORD ROBERTSON.—In the view which I take of it this case is one of great simplicity both in fact and in law.

A foreign shipowner (the respondents' firm) employs a Leith shipbroker (the appellants) on the usual terms of remuneration to find freight for a steamship. The appellants take the business in hand and report that they have concluded a bargain. In fact no bargain had been concluded; differences, which the appellants, too sanguine, had hoped to get rid of existed and proved invincible; and three days after the news of the bargain the respondents learned that the thing was off.

That the appellants, by making this misstatement, acted in violation of their duty as agents for the respondents admits of no doubt; and the respondents have a good claim of damages for whatever loss has been caused them. If, for example, acting on the faith of the alleged contract, the respondents had incurred expense, or if, misled into inaction, they had missed other chances for the ship, these and the like would be heads of damage.

The facts in the present case are not of this kind. The respondents, in furtherance of their theory of their case, have been at pains to prove that at this particular time no other advantageous freights were to be had, and, when informed that the bargain was off, they made no efforts to look for them. They found employment for the steamer in a quarter where it was easily to be had (under a current contract) although at a low rate, 5s. per ton.

The claim of the respondents is for the difference between this rate and 7s. 6d. per ton, the rate in the bargain which was not concluded; and their theory is that they are entitled to take the appellants at their word, and demand from them fulfilment of the charter or damages. To this the short answer is that the appellants (who dealt with Ireland at arm's length) did not in point of fact assume to act for the alleged charterers at all, and they purported to report the agreement of the charterers as matter of fact.

April 14, 1905. Salvesen & Co. v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Nordstjernan.

The central and crucial fact in the case is that the appellants did not represent to the respondents that they acted for Irelands. The case is therefore not within the scope of Collen v. Wright.[1]

The practical result is that in my opinion the main part of the claim of damages is untenable. But I think that the respondents are entitled to something for certain damage which they have proved, to wit, trouble, outlays on telegrams, and the like; and in the Court of Session this has been fixed at £33, 1s. 3d. They have been also held entitled to the expenses incurred by them in the action against Messrs Ireland down to the closing of the record, and I think that they are entitled to this; but this limitation of those expenses to the period before closing the record is not specified in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, although it is in his judgment, and it should, perhaps, therefore, be now declared.

"ORDERED AND ADJUDGED, that the said interlocutor of the 16th day of January 1903, complained of, and the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 16th day of April 1902, also complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same are hereby, varied by striking out the figures '£450,' and inserting in lieu thereof the figures '£33, 1s. 3d.,' and by adding after the word 'record' occurring in the said interlocutor of the 16th day of April 1902, the words 'but down to the closing of the record in that action only,' and that, subject to the said variation, the said interlocutors be, and the same are hereby, affirmed: Further ordered, that the said cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with a direction to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this judgment and variation: And it is further ordered, that the respondents do pay, or cause to be paid, to the said appellants the costs incurred in respect of the said appeal to this House."

Watt v. Assets Co.

"What property do you possess, and what is its nature and value to the best of your knowledge and belief?" The discharge, which followed on a compromise approved by the Court, bore to be "on the basis, and on condition of the truth, accuracy, and completeness" of the said state.

In 1901 the Assets Company, Limited, who were in right of the whole assets of the Bank, raised against Bain's trustees an action of reduction of the interlocutor approving of the compromise and of the discharge by the liquidators, on the ground that two promissory-notes granted in Bain's favour by his sons previous to his discharge were not disclosed in the state of his affairs upon which the discharge proceeded.

A majority of the Second Division, with three consulted Judges, after a proof, held that the discharge fell to be reduced.

In an appeal held (rev. the judgment) (1) that it was not a condition of the discharge that the contributory's disclosure of his assets should be in writing, (2) that as twenty years had elapsed since the date of the discharge the onus lay upon the pursuers of proving that Bain had not made a full disclosure of his assets either in writing or orally, (3) that the pursuers had failed to discharge this onus, and that defenders were entitled to absolvitor.

Observed (per the Lord Chancellor) that an unintentional and non-fraudulent inaccuracy in the disclosure would not invalidate the discharge.

An appeal in a similar action raised by the Assets Company against Watt and Others (Phillips' Trustees) was disposed of in the same way.

(COURT OF SESSION Reports, 6 F. 676, 692, 754.)

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Macnaghten. Lord Davey. Lord James. Ld. Robertson.

1. Assets Co. v. Bain and Others (Bain's Trustees).

In the liquidation of the City of Glasgow Bank the liquidators in 1879 entered into a compromise with Mr William Bain one of the contributories. Mr Bain died in November 1882.

In June 1901 the Assets Company (which had acquired the assets of the bank in 1882), raised an action against Mr Bain's testamentary trustees, concluding for reduction of Mr Bain's discharge by the liquidators of the bank, and for payment by them as trustees of £63,000 of calls, on the ground that the deceased Mr Bain had not made a full disclosure of his assets to the liquidators, and in particular had failed to disclose two promissory-notes granted in his favour by his sons.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.

On 18th March 1904 the Second Division, with three consulted Judges, by a majority recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and granted decree of reduction as concluded for, and quoad ultra remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the case.—See Court of Session report, 6 F. 692.

The defenders appealed.

2. Assets Co. v. Watt and Others (Phillips' Trustees).

This was a similar action against John Watt and others, the testamentary trustees of the late Alexander Phillips, who died in 1881. In this case the alleged non-disclosure related to shares in certain shipping companies.

The interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) and of the Second Division, with three consulted Judges, were similar to those in the case of Bain's Trustees.—See Court of Session report, 6 F. 754.

The defenders appealed.

The House of Lords, after hearing counsel in each appeal on the facts disclosed in the evidence, but without calling for argument on the pleas of (1) Title to sue, and (2) Competency of suing discharged trustees, which had been argued in the Court of Session, delivered judgment,—

Watt v. Assets Co.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—These appeals arise on two independent cases, but I think they are open to the same observations, and although they may in some comparatively immaterial particulars differ from each other, the substance of the matter to be discussed is a matter which is common to both. I confess I am of opinion that these appeals ought to succeed.

I agree with the learned Lord Ordinary, and to some extent with Lord Kinnear also, although in the result he differed, and with the other learned Judges who gave judgment in favour of the appellants. It appears to me that the matter rests, not upon any question of technical law, but upon broad common sense, and especially upon these two principles—that at this distance of time every intendment should be made in favour of what has been done as being lawfully and properly done, and that the persons who are now insisting upon these rights have lain asleep upon their rights so long that as a matter of fact we know that witnesses have perished, and the opportunities which might have been had if the question had been earlier raised have passed away. We are asked at a distance, in the one case of twenty years, and in the other case of twenty-two years, to rip up a transaction which had apparently been completely disposed of.

The question arises in this way: Those who are appearing as litigants in this case, the pursuers, are asking to have undone a release, a compromise, which has now been in existence for twenty years; and they ask it upon grounds which seem to me to be unsound for more reasons than one. In the first place, I wish to say that I do not concur with the view which has found favour with some of the learned Judges below, that this compromise, and the release which has been executed in pursuance of that compromise, must be so construed that nothing but that which is contained in the written document itself can be applied to as explaining or affecting the legal effect of the document. If I understand the argument rightly, it comes to this: You have in this document made it part of your bargain that you shall disclose all your effects. I want to introduce into that, as part of the legal effect of the instrument, not only that you must disclose, but that you must disclose in writing, and in this writing, all your effects. The questions have been propounded for the purpose of getting written answers to those questions. The questions are intended to ransack your whole estate; and if you do not disclose all your estate, nay, further, if you do not disclose it by written answers to these written interrogatories, it must be part of the condition of this release that the release thereupon becomes void. It seems to me that that is an unsound view of this document for more reasons than one, particularly for the reason which one of the learned Judges points out, that the statement on which the release is granted is made to the best knowledge and belief of the person executing the document that such is the state of his affairs. Unless something much more definite were placed in the document to make the accuracy of the statement therein a part of the contract, as is done in some policies of insurance, so that any inaccuracy should avoid the instrument executed, I decline to put into that document either by express words or by implication something which is not there. The statement appears to be made according to the knowledge and belief of the person who is making the declaration, and therefore, if according to the belief of the person who made it this was the true and accurate state of affairs, even though it should turn out to be inaccurate, I construe that document as making it a perfectly good release notwithstanding an inaccuracy, an unintentional and non-fraudulent inaccuracy, which afterwards might be discovered in it.

Therefore I differ entirely from the view that the disclosure must either be in writing or must be in the particular document in writing. If a disclosure was made at the time to those who were entitled to put the questions and take the answers, even though it was made verbally, I am of opinion that that would be enough to make the release a perfectly good release.

With regard to Lord President Inglis' judgment,[1] it was said that his observations were obiter. I am not quite certain that I concur in that view, though I notice one of the learned counsel said he submitted it was obiter. When a learned Judge is giving his views why this or that does not come within the meaning of the law which makes a thing inoperative, and when he distinguishes the case before him by pointing out that there was no fraud, and, therefore, the fraud imputed did not exist, I very much doubt whether that is one of those things which can be described as a mere obiter dictum. It is part of the law which is guiding his judgment, and part of the law he is bound to expound in the judgment he is pronouncing. So far, therefore, I am bound to say that the two propositions of law which appear to have supported the judgment of the Court below I am unable to concur in; on the contrary, I wish to express my entire dissent.

With regard to the facts upon which the question then turns, I do not think any very elaborate exposition is required. There are two things which are indicated here as points upon which disclosure was withheld: in the one case certain shares, and in the other case two promissory-notes are alleged, and must, in order to make the case insisted upon by the pursuers, be alleged to have been withheld, and in truth a false statement made in respect to them.

With regard to the question of the shares, to my mind, assuming I am right in the view I have taken that a verbal statement is sufficient, it only requires to be stated in a very few simple sentences to point out how extremely unreasonable at all events is the suggestion that the mere non-statement of these shares ought of itself, at this distance of time, to set aside the release. A number of shares undoubtedly existed. If they were valueless, I should have thought it was not at all an unlikely thing to happen (I am speaking now of ordinary inferences of fact from the facts in proof rather than any presumption of law one way or the other), that those who were charged with the administration of the affairs of the Glasgow Bank on its insolvency would have been very shy of taking up these absolutely useless shares and encumbering their statement of affairs with them. And what were these shares? These shares were shares of a shipping company which from its commencement had made losses, whose ships, according to the evidence, were unfitted for the services for which they were intended, and as to which there was no reasonable expectation that they would make a commercial success. To my mind it was not an unreasonable suggestion that these shares were not considered of any value, and were not put down in the list. It is said,—"But at all events these were shares that might become of value." I do not think anybody believed that they would become of value. Therefore, at all events at this distance of time, I am not going to assume that they were thought to be of value at a time when I should think nobody supposed they were of value.

Then it is said that they were kept back—that he "kept them dark": I think that was the phrase used by one of the learned counsel. I do not understand quite what that referred to. If this gentleman, who was equally with the other a person of character and position, had intended to keep back the existence of those shares as part of his assets, there are very familiar modes by which he could have done that without exposing himself to risk. When he was getting together a good deal of money, both from friends and others and himself, and buying his discharge, as it were, from the liability, he might have adopted various devices—one is so familiar with this sort of device that it becomes hardly necessary to state it—he might have conveyed every one of these shares to somebody or another who would have no responsibility, and have had a secret trust if he had any thought of their being of value. Instead of that, from the time he makes this statement until the time of his death, eighteen months afterwards, the shares are allowed to remain in his own name, capable of being ascertained, and capable of being known to be his; and yet I am to assume that he was either fraudulent, or at all events endeavouring not to do what he had agreed to do—namely, to give up his whole estate notwithstanding the effort that he was making to free himself from liability. If he was fraudulent, is it conceivable that he would have allowed this to remain after him as a perpetual drag upon whatever he did leave behind him, and so give the opportunity of detection and of avoiding the effect of what he was doing?

Then it is said, and said with great force, But he died eighteen months afterwards, and then facts were exhibited which could not be concealed and must be known as to the state of his affairs. He left behind him a considerable sum—that is, considerable having regard to what he had been doing, that is to say, making a compromise. Then why was not that at once made the subject of inquiry after his death within eighteen months of his compromise? I think it is not necessary for me to pursue this line of observation. One of the learned Judges, I think, has not exaggerated the state of facts when he points out the number of deaths that have intervened, and the impossibility at this distance of time of disentangling what could have been very easily disentangled and ascertained if an earlier investigation had taken place.

I do not propose to differentiate Watt's appeal from the case of Mr Bain, although to some extent there is a difference between them. All I shall say about either of them is that at this distance of time I shall make every intendment in favour of that having been honestly done which purported to be done. I think I should expect some evidence to be produced contradicting that state of things rather than insist on evidence in its support at this distance of time, and with the loss of evidence that undoubtedly has occurred from the delay that has taken place. I should be content to rest my judgment on the language of the Lord Ordinary himself, in which, on both occasions, he has pointed out, I think with great force and accuracy, the result that ought to follow from the absence of evidence which has been the fault of those who are the pursuers here—that is to say, they have lain by upon their supposed rights all this time, during which time witnesses have died and the means of explanation have disappeared also to an extent which, to my mind, renders it impossible, or at all events extremely inexpedient as a matter of law and administration, to allow these things to be ripped up at this distance of time, when both the opportunities of explanation have gone by and when witnesses have passed away.

Under these circumstances I move your Lordships that both these appeals be allowed; that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary be restored; and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I concur. I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is perfectly sound, and I think it ought to be restored.

LORD DAVEY.—I also agree.

The case has been so copiously considered in the Court of Session in the numerous judgments, to which I have given my best attention, that I think I should not be justified in saying more than that I agree with Lord Kyllachy, Lord Young, and Lord Moncreiff.

I only wish to add this, that in coming to this conclusion I am not treating mora or delay as a plea in law. I do not think it is a plea in law; but I think the lapse of time is a circumstance which ought to be taken into account and ought largely to influence our estimate of and the conclusion we come to upon the facts of the case.

LORD JAMES.—I also concur.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I entirely agree in the general principles stated by the Lord Chancellor as applicable to an action of this nature, brought after this lapse of time. For a more detailed examination of the facts of the case I would refer to the judgment of Lord Kyllachy in each case, entirely concurring as I do with all that his Lordship has said.

"IN the case of Watt and others, Ordered that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, that the interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy of June 13, 1903, be restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below."

July 28, 1905. Watson v. M'Ewan. The defender appealed.

The pursuer presented a cross appeal against the disallowance of the first issue.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord James. Ld. Robertson.

Lord Chancellor.—When one examines these two appeals,* I think it is impossible to say that any different question arises in the one from that which arises in the other. The same judgment is applicable to both.

When one examines with care the different allegations made in the condescendences and the answers, I do not think any question arises as to the confidential nature of the employment between patient and medical man. I do not propose to express any opinion upon what would be the legal determination of that question if it arose. It may be that it raises very serious and difficult questions, and I certainly am not disposed to express an opinion either way in respect of questions which upon other grounds have no difficulty at all in their solution. The broad proposition I entertain no doubt about, and it seems to me to be the only question that properly arises here; as to the immunity of a witness for evidence given in a Court of justice, it is too late to argue that as if it were doubtful. By complete authority, including the authority of this House, it has been decided that the privilege of a witness, the immunity from responsibility in an action when evidence has been given by him in a Court of justice, is too well established now to be shaken. Practically I may say that in my view it is absolutely unarguable—it is settled law and cannot be doubted. The remedy against a witness who has given evidence which is false and injurious to another is to indict him for perjury; but for very obvious reasons, the conduct of legal procedure by Courts of justice, with the necessity of compelling witnesses to attend, involves as one of the necessities of the administration of justice the immunity of witnesses from actions being brought against them in respect of evidence they have given. So far the matter, I think, is too plain for argument.

But then comes the question which, so far as I know, has been raised for the first time in this case. The ingenious suggestion has been made that although it is true that a witness is protected from an action in respect of evidence actually given in a Court of justice, yet no such protection exists in respect of his attendance before the solicitor at what is called apparently in Scottish law his precognition—what we call the interview between the intended witness and the solicitor who takes from him what we call the proof—that is to say, reduces to writing the evidence which the witness is about to give. One very serious element of difficulty which those who insist upon such a liability have to meet is manifest—namely, that in the whole course of the diligent inquiry that the learned counsel on both sides have made into this matter they have not found that any such liability has ever been sought to be established before. So far as I know personally in my experience no such question has ever arisen. The learned Judges who have allowed these issues have done so apparently for the first time in this case.

It appears to me that the privilege which surrounds the evidence actually given in a Court of justice necessarily involves the same privilege in the case of making a statement to a solicitor and other persons who are engaged in the conduct of proceedings in Courts of justice when what is intended to be stated in a Court of justice is narrated to them—that is, to the solicitor or Writer to the Signet. If it were otherwise, I think what one of the learned counsel has with great cogency pointed out would apply—that from time to time in these various efforts which have been made to make actual witnesses responsible in the shape of an action against them for the evidence they have given, the difficulty in the way of those who were bringing the action would have been removed at once by saying, "I do not bring the action against you for what you said in the witness-box, but I bring the action against you for what you told the solicitor you were about to say in the witness-box." If that could be done the object for which the privilege exists is gone, because then no witness could be called; no one would know whether what he was going to say was relevant to the question in debate between the parties. A witness would only have to say, "I shall not tell you anything; I may have an action brought against me to-morrow if I do; therefore I shall not give you any information at all." It is very obvious that the public policy which renders the protection of witnesses necessary for the administration of justice must as a necessary consequence involve that which is a step towards and is part of the administration of justice, namely, the preliminary examination of witnesses to find out what they can prove. It may be that to some extent it seems to impose a hardship, but after all the hardship is not to be compared with that which would arise if it were impossible to administer justice, because people would be afraid to give their testimony.

The hardship to which I refer is this: That although when a witness does give evidence which is wilfully false you can indict him for perjury; on the other hand, if he makes the same statement, not upon oath, to a person taking down the evidence he is prepared to give, it seems to be very difficult to devise anything that would bring him to justice for that false statement. The answer, of course, dealing with it as a matter of convenience and indeed of necessity for the administration of justice, I suppose, is this: Unless he does give evidence in a Court of justice, in which case he can be indicted for perjury if his evidence is wilfully false, nobody knows anything about it—it slumbers, I suppose, in the office of the solicitor, and nobody hears or cares anything about it. Practically, I think that would be the answer. But whether that be a good answer or not, what seems to me to be an overwhelming consideration in the determination of this case is that a witness must be protected for his preliminary statement or he has no protection at all, and that there is that protection established is, as I have already said, beyond all possibility of doubt.

Now, the reason why I think that this is the only question that arises is this: It is true that the gentleman sued is an eminent medical man, and that there is a mixture of the points both in the condescendences and in the answers which has rather tended to confusion; but if one comes to look with care at the different forms of procedure one sees that everything that passed, everything that is alleged to have passed, passed between the defender and those who were engaged in the legal business. The communication complained of was no communication to strangers—to persons outside the litigation. The communication such as it is was made to the counsel and to the solicitor who was taking down the evidence. Under those circumstances it seems to me that it comes within the whole mischief of the supposed liability of a witness for what he had stated. I do not care whether he is what is called a volunteer or not; if he is a person engaged in the administration of justice, on whichever side he is called his duty is to tell the truth and the whole truth. If he tells the truth and the whole truth, it matters not on whose behalf he is called as a witness; in respect of what he swears as a witness he is protected—that cannot be denied—and when he is being examined for the purpose of being a witness he is bound to tell the whole truth according to his views, otherwise the precognition, the examination to ascertain what he will prove in the witness-box, would be worth nothing.

Under those circumstances, my Lords, it appears to me that there is but one point in this case, namely, whether the preliminary examination of a witness by a solicitor is within the same privilege as that which he would have if he had said the same thing in his sworn testimony in Court. I think the privilege is the same, and for that reason I think these judgments ought to be reversed, and I move accordingly.

LORD JAMES.—I concur in the result which has been arrived at, and for the reasons which have been expressed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

LORD ROBERTSON.—So do I.

Campbell, K.C.—I understand your Lordships to intend that we should get the costs of the appeal.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Yes. I think in this case the proper order is to remit to the Court of Session to dismiss the action with costs; and in the cross appeal we dismiss the appeal with costs, and the order will be the same in the case of Watson v. Jones.

"ORDERED AND ADJUDGED, that the interlocutors in part complained of in the original and cross appeals be, and the same are hereby, discharged, and that the cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with a direction to dismiss the action and to find the appellant in the original appeal (defender below) entitled to expenses in the Court of Session: And it is further ordered that the said cross appeal be, and the same is hereby, dismissed this House: And it is further ordered that the respondent in the original appeal (pursuer below) do pay, or cause to be paid, to the said appellant (defender below) the costs incurred by him in respect of the said original and cross appeals to this House."

Harbour—Boundary—Foreshore—Rights of owners of foreshore included in harbour—Statute—Construction—Musselburgh Harbour Act, 1840 (3 Vict. cap. lxxiii.), secs. 2, 49, 76.—The Musselburgh Harbour Act, 1840, sec. 2, enacts that the word "harbour" shall be understood to mean the "Harbour of Fisherrow," and shall include the whole precincts thereof as after specified.

Sec. 76 enacts that for the purposes of this Act, and for no other purpose whatever, the said harbour shall be deemed to extend "along the shore" from the M. Burn on the west to the R. Burn on the east, and to seaward to the extent of one hundred yards beyond low-water mark opposite the shore between the aforesaid burns. The distance between the two burns was about two miles.

Sec. 49 makes it unlawful for "any person to dig or take away from the said harbour or its precincts any sand, gravel, shingle, or stones," except with the authority of the Harbour Commissioners.

In an action by the Harbour Commissioners against persons claiming to be the proprietors of part of the foreshore between the two burns, held (aff. judgment of Second Division) (1) that the harbour and its precincts included the whole foreshore between the two burns, rejecting a plea for the defenders that the words "along the shore" in sec. 76 of the Act excluded the foreshore; and (2) that the defenders, although owners of part of the foreshore, were not entitled to remove sand from their part without the authority of the Harbour Commissioners.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case I confess I have not been able to entertain any doubt that the judgment of the Court below is right, and ought to be affirmed.

It appears to me that the provisions of the statute are too plain to raise any ambiguity. If one thinks that the words "the precincts" require exposition, they are, in my opinion, explained by the statute itself. It is clear from what has been said that the statute does draw a distinction between two different areas—one is the harbour and the other is the precincts—and while it prohibits any person "to throw any ballast, dirt, ashes, rubbish, shingle, sand, stones, and other things into the said harbour, or to do any other act, matter, or thing to prejudice or injure the same or any part thereof," it also, as a separate part of the section, and distinguishing between the harbour and what it then deals with, prohibits any person "to dig or take away from the said harbour or its precincts any sand, gravel, shingle, or stones for ballast or any other purpose except from such place or places as shall from time to time be appointed for that purpose under the authority of the said Commissioners."

It is said by the statute itself that the precincts are defined in the statute. Now, unless the limits of a mile on each side of the harbour are the precincts referred to, there is no such definition as the statute itself alleges to exist in it, the inference from which is that those must be the precincts.

July 31, 1905. Musselburgh Real Estate Co. v. Magistrates of Musselburgh.

It is manifest also, I think, when one looks at the language of the statute, that whether or not the framers of the statute were right in their view, it was intended to prohibit, except with the permission of the commissioners, to whom discretion was entrusted, anybody—"any person," to use the language of the statute—taking away sand, gravel, shingle, or stones from somewhere other than the harbour itself, and if it had been intended only to protect what I have described as the immediate vicinity of the harbour, it was easy to say so, or to say, "so near the harbour as shall be injurious to its foundations" or what not; instead of which the statute uses the word "precincts," which it professes to define, and makes those precincts extend for a mile on each side of the harbour. It seems to me that in order to construe it as the learned Lord Advocate would have it construed, you must read into the statute words which are not there; and indeed he has not denied that that is so. That is the first objection, and it appears to me to be a very cogent one, to construing the section as he suggests, that you must introduce words which are not there.

Now, it is said, and I think justly said, that it is contrary to the policy of Parliament to take away rights—to give anything in the nature of property to others without giving compensation for it. But I think, on the other hand, it must be frankly admitted that where you are dealing with public necessities and public security, Parliament does sometimes do that. As it has been pointed out, it does it with respect to roads, and I think it does it with respect to harbours also. This is one of those provisions which must be construed in connection with the particular subject-matter with which Parliament was then dealing. It might well be that in the view of Parliament, although the giving of these rights, not a proprietary right at all, but a right to prohibit something which in their view would interfere with the harbour, might to some extent restrain the complete liberty of the proprietors in respect of the use of that which was their own property, and prevent the proprietor of the shore taking away his sand, yet, on the other hand, the construction and maintenance of the harbour would in itself be an advantage to the adjoining proprietors. One cannot doubt that it would add to the value of their adjacent land; and it might well be that, in view of that additional value and the advantage conferred upon their land, Parliament would take away, not absolutely their property, but the right of taking sand from any part within these two miles. But even that right is not absolutely taken away, for discretion is confided to the commissioners, so that they may permit sand to be taken if they think right. Parliament has confided a discretion to them in the view that, as they are the persons who are interested in the maintenance of the harbour, nothing would be permitted by them which would interfere with the security which that harbour is intended to afford to all vessels frequenting that port.

Therefore it seems to me that the only thing we have to do with is the construction of the 49th section. I do not understand why we should extend our inquiries to a wider field than that mere question. Neither the pleadings nor indeed the facts as they are put before us in this case appear to me to raise any other question than these: First, What are the precincts? The answer to that I have already given—namely, those that are indicated by the statute. If they are not those, there are none other, and yet the statute says there are precincts indicated in the statute. Secondly, when the question of public advantage is considered, it seems to me to displace the argument—I admit a very cogent one very often—that no compensation is provided for the proprietors. That objection is answered, as I endeavoured to answer it, by saying that Parliament may have considered the advantage conferred as equivalent to the disadvantage enforced upon them. But really the whole truth, in my view, is that the statute is plain and unambiguous, and I cannot and will not introduce words into the statute which are not there. I must read the statute according to its plain and simple meaning, and, so construing it, I think the judgment of the Court of Session is right, and I move your Lordships, therefore, that the interlocutors be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur entirely with the views which have been expressed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

The case has been very fully and very ingeniously argued, and our attention has been directed to every syllable of the statute which has the slightest relevancy to the subject-matter, and also the bye-laws have been prayed in aid, and we have been asked to consider them. It is quite right that our attention should have been so directed to these matters; but after all the entire question comes back to what is the construction of sec. 49. If the question had been argued at even greater length than it was, legitimately, presented to us, it would always come back to that question. The bye-laws can give no substantial assistance here in arriving at any conclusion in respect of the matter before us. They may shew the opinions from time to time held as to how the discretion should be exercised by those who were responsible for making those bye-laws, but the bye-laws get their authority from, and their origin must be found in, sec. 49; if they are suggested to be incomplete, the answer must always be given, "We will try again under the power and discretion as vested in us by sec. 49."

When one comes to sec. 49, one finds that it is about as clear a section as was ever framed by the Legislature. It is absolutely distinct and unqualified in all its terms. If one is not to place upon sec. 49 the meaning which was placed upon it by the Lord Ordinary in his clear and well-considered judgment, it is only by praying in aid the possible introduction of other topics, other considerations, and other words. Of course that is not a legitimate way of interpreting any Act of Parliament. I therefore set aside the bye-laws as throwing no substantial light, giving no assistance to us, in construing sec. 49, and I look entirely to the construction that is to be given to the clear words of the section, the one important section, that has to be construed upon the present occasion.

The Act was passed as far back as the year 1840; its sections shew that notices must have been given to the parties concerned that there were plans and books of reference which it is stated comprised actually the name of one of the Lord Advocate's clients. There are no people now to tell us exactly what occurred on that occasion, but I assume that the passing of the Act of Parliament was a matter of very common knowledge, and that the parties interested in it had every opportunity of considering and knowing and being thoroughly acquainted with all that was being done. That being so, the Act of Parliament was passed, comprising in its terms the section which has been so often referred to. Every person interested had every possible opportunity, I assume, of considering the bearings and the possible constructions which might be given to the operations under that section. That being so, the presentation of the case to us by the Lord Advocate and his learned and very able junior colleague is this: that no matter how clear, no matter how unqualified it may be, it is to be read as excluding, by the introduction of words which are not found there, a class of persons who are to be regarded as private owners; their contention is that it must be so read that it will not interfere with or in the slightest degree disturb any of the discretion that might be exercised by a private owner. On the other hand this must be borne in mind—that, as has been pointed out to us upon the other side with great force, the statute is clear and unqualified—that it does not suggest the possibility of the introduction in the construction of any words or meaning which are not to be found upon the face of it. I think there is immense weight in the words quoted to-day from the judgment of Bowen, L.-J., in the case of the London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Evans.[1] Here we find words which are clear and distinct. We find that the Legislature, knowing what it was doing, thought proper to introduce those words—they are not words which expropriate—they are words which give a discretionary power of control and management in the exercise of what we must conceive to be the honest discretion of honest and capable administrators. That was done, not for a private or personal purpose, but for a public purpose which we must assume to have been worthy of being protected by words as clear and unqualified as those we find in sec. 49 of this Act.

For those reasons I entirely concur in the conclusion announced by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

Lord Robertson.—I agree in the judgment which has been proposed, and also in all that has been said.

Interlocutors appealed from affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

An heir of entail who had paid estate-duty due on the death of his predecessor died without having applied for a certificate or taken any steps to charge the sum so paid on the entailed estate.

The Crown having claimed estate-duty on the sum so paid from his trustees, held (rev. judgment of First Division) that under sec. 9, subsec. 6, the heir of entail, being a person having a limited interest who had paid the estate-duty, had by the statute the same charge on the estate as if he held a mortgage over the estate for the amount of the duty, and that the charge being a vested transmissible interest belonging to the deceased at the time of his death, his trustees were liable for the duty.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). Lord Macnaghten. Lord Davey. Lord James. Ld. Robertson. Ld. Dunedin.

Lord Chancellor.—This case turns upon the 6th subsection of sec. 9 of the Finance Act, 1894. As I understand it, the question is whether a sum of £37,740, which had been paid by the late Earl of Moray in respect of estate-duty, formed a transmissible interest, so that the Crown could claim duty upon it.

Two questions of a very different character appear to me to arise: one is whether the heir of entail, as the Earl was, is a limited owner within the meaning of the 6th subsection. I do not think it necessary to discuss that question at length, inasmuch as I understand that that point has been decided in Scotland, and I see no reason to question the propriety of the decision.

The other question appears to arise in respect of the appropriateness of the mode and manner by which the statute is to be effective in Scotland. Now to my mind the objection is of a character that would apparently displace the authority of the Legislature in respect of the technology of one part of the United Kingdom. I quite admit that for a time I certainly was very much impressed by Mr Clyde's argument that, apparently by common consent among those who are familiar with Scottish forms of conveyancing, the language of the statute is absolutely inappropriate. I think one learned Judge even goes so far as to say that it is unmeaning. I cannot quite concur in that, because, although it may be very inappropriate language, I do not think anyone can really doubt what the meaning of the statute is; and if, although inappropriate language is used, it is known what the meaning of the Legislature is, that meaning must be obeyed in whatever form it may be necessary to adapt the practice of conveyancers to the particular thing that is to be done.

Now, the question here is whether this is a charge or can be made a charge upon the estate in respect of which the late Earl did pay £37,740. I observe that those familiar with the subject are able to point out modes by which the thing can be effected although the language by which it is directed is absolutely inappropriate to Scottish conveyancing. To my mind the whole question has been expounded with great precision and accuracy by my noble and learned friend Lord Dunedin, whose judgment I am about to read. It is quite clear that whether you call it a charge, or by whatever word you choose to signify it, the thing meant is obvious enough, and the justice of it, if there be justice in it, is manifest enough. A limited owner having to pay for something which is not entirely his own, the Legislature has thought it right that there should be a charge upon the estate in respect of which he has paid it for such and such an amount. That is an intelligible proposition. If it could be said that one person is paying upon the property of another person, I cannot help thinking that the injustice, if there be injustice, is inherent in the nature of the statute, and does not arise from the construction which is to be placed upon it. One mode of illustrating and manifesting that, I think, is this—that if the question arose in England no lawyer would entertain any doubt that it could be properly effected; and is any difference to be made because it is in another part of the United Kingdom to which the Act equally applies, and because the language of conveyancers in that part of the Kingdom must be admitted to be absolutely inappropriate to the thing that is to be done? As regards the substance of the matter, when one looks through the mere technology and sees what is intended to be done, the thing is obvious enough.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that the enactment of the Legislature must be obeyed, and that the judgment of the Court below ought, therefore, to be reversed.

Lord Macnaghten.—I am not at all insensible to the grave difficulties which have been pointed out so forcibly by the learned Judges in Scotland. But I cannot think that those difficulties are insuperable. It must be borne in mind that the Act which your Lordships are now called upon to construe in its application to Scotland applies equally to the whole of the United Kingdom. It is a taxing Act. It must be presumed to have been the intention of Parliament to make the incidence of the taxation the same in Scotland as in England and Ireland, and to extend the same measure of relief, such as it is, to limited owners called upon to discharge a burthen on the inheritance wherever the property burthened may be situated.

Your Lordships may remember that much the same sort of question arose in Lord Saltoun's case,[1] which was referred to in this House not long ago in Special Commissioners for Income-Tax v. Pemsel.[2] In Lord Saltoun's case[1] the Succession-Duty Act, 1853, came under consideration, and it was held by this House, reversing the judgment of the Court of Session, that an extrinsic technicality—a technical rule of Scotch feudal conveyancing—must be disregarded when its effect would be to produce inequality. I may, perhaps, be permitted to remind your Lordships of a passage in the judgment of Lord Cranworth in that case, in which his Lordship, speaking of the decision then about to be pronounced, used these words,—"This decision, though it would do violence to some of the best-established doctrines of Scotch law if the present question were one of conveyancing, may yet be well admitted in the construction of an Act intended to impose corresponding duties on succession happening under two different systems of law."

With these remarks I would ask your Lordships' attention to the language of the enactment which your Lordships have to apply to the case under consideration. The Finance Act, 1894, sec. 9, subsec. 6, declares that "a person having a limited interest in any property who pays the estate-duty in respect of that property shall be entitled to the like charge as if the estate-duty in respect of that property had been raised by means of a mortgage to him." He has, therefore, a statutory charge upon the property of the same effect and validity as if the charge had been created by a mortgage duly executed by a person or persons capable of creating such a charge. As applied to England and English land, the enactment is too clear for argument. The charge arises automatically. A person who is declared by statute to be entitled to a charge on doing a certain act gets the charge on doing the act by virtue of the statute. Nothing more is required to be said or done to perfect his security.

Now, one has to apply this provision to land in Scotland, in respect of which the owner, being a limited owner, has paid the duty. The Courts in Scotland hold, and as it seems to me rightly hold, that an heir of entail in the position of the late Lord Moray is a limited owner. If the land in respect of which the duty was paid had been in England or Ireland, he would undoubtedly have had a charge for the amount paid. Why should he be at a disadvantage because the land in respect of which the duty is paid is situated in Scotland? The notion of charging Scottish property in this way may perhaps (to use Lord Cranworth's language) "do violence to some of the best-established doctrines of Scotch law." But still Parliament is omnipotent. The Courts in Scotland must give effect to the statute. I have no doubt that those Courts, on a proper application, could find some means of perfecting the security by a declaration duly recorded, or perhaps in some more appropriate way.

I need say nothing further upon this point, because I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Dunedin, and, if I may say so with all respect, I agree in it entirely.

I think the Crown is entitled to judgment, and the appeal ought to be allowed.

Lord Davey.—I hope that I have fully appreciated the views taken of this case by the learned Judges in the Court of Session, and so powerfully put before us by Mr Clyde in his argument for the respondents. The reasons given by the learned Judges for their judgment undoubtedly oblige your Lordships to consider this case with some anxiety. I find myself, however, unable to agree in the conclusion arrived at and expressed in the interlocutors under appeal.

The question in this appeal is whether the late Lord Moray at the time of his death had a vested transmissible interest in the sum of £37,740, paid by him for instalments of the estate-duty which had become payable by him to the Crown on the family settled estate to which he had succeeded as heir of entail in 1895. And the answer to the question depends primarily on the right construction of sec. 9, subsec. 6, of the Finance Act, 1894. By subsec. 1 of that section the estate-duty is made a first charge on the property in respect of which the duty is leviable. By subsec. 5 a person required to pay the estate-duty is empowered to raise the amount of such duty and any interest and expenses by sale or mortgage of the property, or any part thereof. Subsec. 6 is in the following words: "A person having a limited interest in any property, who pays the estate-duty in respect of that property, shall be entitled to the like charge as if the estate-duty in respect of that property had been raised by means of a mortgage to him."

It has been argued that an heir of entail, though under a strict entail, is not a person having a limited interest in the entailed estate. The contrary has been decided in the case of Laurie.[1] It is true he is in law a fiar, subject, however, to the fetters on his power of disposition. It is true also that means have been provided by the Legislature by which he can free himself from the fetters under certain onerous conditions, but so long as they remain, he has, in my opinion, only a limited interest within the meaning of the Act.

On the construction of the 6th section two general observations may be made. First, the section applies to England and Scotland alike, and should, I presume, receive the same construction on both sides of the Tweed. And I think that the same principle applies as was laid down in this House with regard to the Succession-Duty Act—Lord Braybrooke v. Attorney-General[2] —that the Act is not to be construed according to the technicalities of the law of England or Scotland, but according to the popular use of the language employed. Secondly, it should be pointed out that the words "charge" (in this connection) and "mortgage" are not technical words in England any more than in Scotland. As regards this subject-matter, a charge in popular language is a burden on land, or the right to have a sum of money with which the estate is burdened raised out of it. A mortgage is but a security for money lent.

As to the meaning of the words in subsec. 6, apart from any technical difficulties of application, I should have thought there could not be any difference of opinion. They appear to me to mean that the limited owner who has paid the duty is put in the same position as if he had lent the money for the purpose on the security of a mortgage of the estate to himself. And I think the subsection gives him all the rights of the holder of a valid and effectual security on the property. To construe the words as meaning only that he may give himself such a charge seems to me at variance with the plain meaning of the language used, and to give no effect to the words at the end of the section which the Legislature has used for the purpose of defining the nature of the charge to which the limited owner has become entitled on payment.

It humbly appears to me irrelevant to discuss whether such a charge or burden could be created by one individual in favour of another without prescribed formalities. This charge is created by the Legislature, and similar charges have been created by other taxing Acts. It does not appear to me a sufficient answer to say that the charge in the Succession-Duty Act is in favour of the Crown. It makes no difference in the discussion of the means of effectuating the charge whether the holder of the charge is the Crown or a subject. What the rights of the holder of a valid security are it is not necessary for me to say.

Nor are your Lordships required in the present case to say by what means the intention of the Legislature may be effected. It would be for the Court of Session to determine whether it would give effect to the statutory charge by adjudication, or by the appointment of a judicial factor to receive the rents and profits, or by directing the sale of the property and ordaining the persons in whom it is vested to convey, or in some other way. But I have no doubt of the competence as well as the duty of the Court of Session when the question arises to give effect to what I am constrained to hold is the plain meaning of the statute. And I am fortified in so thinking by the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Dunedin, which I have had the opportunity of perusing.

I am therefore of opinion that the late Earl had at the time of his death a transmissible title to a sum of £37,740 to be raised out of the entailed estate. It is said that by the dispositions of his will he released his right in that sum to his successors in the estate. I express no opinion whether he did so or not. But, assuming that he did, it makes no difference to the right of the Crown to duty whether the sum in question passed to one person or another.

I am therefore of opinion that the appeal of the Crown should be allowed.

Lord James.—I concur with the three judgments which have been submitted to your Lordships.

Lord Robertson.—I agree with the judgment of the Court of Session. I had prepared a reasoned opinion, but your Lordships have decided the case, and I should be only occupying time unnecessarily if I read it.

Lord Dunedin (read by the Lord Chancellor).—The facts in this case are simple and undisputed. The late Edmund, Earl of Moray, succeeded as institute of entail in possession to large landed estates in Scotland in the year 1895. Under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, he was liable to pay estate and settlement estate-duty in respect of the estates. He chose to avail himself of the option given by sec. 6, subsec. 8, of that Act to pay by means of sixteen half-yearly instalments. He died in June 1901, having at that time paid eleven of the said instalments, amounting to £37,740, out of his own funds. This action is now raised by the Crown against the defenders, who are the trustees and executors of the said Edmund, Earl of Moray, under a trust-disposition and settlement conveying his property to them, and asks for estate-duty and legacy-duty on the said sum of £37,740. The learned Judges of the First Division of the Court of Session have assoilzied the defenders in respect that in their view the late Earl took no steps during his life to make the £37,740 a charge on the landed estate in favour of himself and his executors, and that, he not having done so, no right to do so passed to his executors.

I am not able to agree with their view, which seems to me not to give proper effect to the provisions of the Finance Act, and is further, I think, not consistent with the judgment of the same Division in the case of Laurie[1] to which I shall presently advert.

The question, I think, is solved by the 9th section of the Act. Before I examine the terms of the section, it may be well to make some general observations on the principle of construction which a Scottish Court is obliged and bound to apply to such a statute. The Finance Act of 1894 is an imperial statute applying to England and Scotland alike. It is useless not to recognise the fact that such statutes are usually framed by draftsmen but little conversant with the forms and requirements of conveyancing in Scotland, and that the phraseology which they employ is apt to be directed by the law of England, with which they are familiar.

In such circumstances the Scottish Court must do its best to give effect to the meaning of the statute, not by treating English law terms as unmeaning symbols, but as terms which, although not terms of art in Scotland, may be taken as words of ordinary popular signification, and as such are capable of application to the Scottish system.

It is true that the defect of expression is sought in some cases—and this is one of them—to be remedied by the provisions of an application clause. But an application clause is an aid to interpretation, not a code, and accordingly if it is defective the Court is not thereby absolved from the duty otherwise cast upon it. I have thought this observation necessary, especially in view of what the Lord Ordinary has here said in his judgment about upsetting the fundamental rules of conveyancing. If the meaning of the statute is clear, then the Court must try and square the rules of conveyancing with that meaning as best it can, and nothing short of sheer impossibility will warrant it coming to the conclusion that a provision which professes to be imperial is denied in Scotland the effect which it has in England. I am far, however, from suggesting that these principles have been hitherto ignored by the Court of Session. On the contrary, they have applied them, as I shall presently shew, to this very section in the case of Laurie.[1] And, further, they have consistently done so in all cases other than those of entail which involve settlement-duty. There is no definition of settled property in the application clause (sec. 23). And if we turn to the general definition clause (sec. 22) we find in (h) and (i) a definition which as a term of art is utterly meaningless to a Scottish conveyancer, but which the Court has had no difficulty in applying as popular phraseology to the forms of Scottish conveyancing.

Lord Advocate v. Earl of Moray's Trustees.

I proceed to examine the provisions of sec. 9. The 6th subsection of that section is in these terms:—"A person having a limited interest in any property, who pays the estate-duty in respect of that property, shall be entitled to the like charge as if the estate-duty in respect of that property had been raised by means of a mortgage to him." I do not understand it to be seriously doubted that an heir of entail answers to the description of a person having a limited interest. His interest, although that of a fiar, is that of a fiar limited by the prohibitive, resolutive, and irritant clauses of the title under which he holds—and it was so held by the First Division in the case of Laurie.[1] That being so, the only point remaining is, What is the meaning of the words "entitled to a charge"? Does this mean that he is in right of a charge; or does it mean that he is in the position to do something which will create a charge, but that until that something is done there is no charge in his favour?

I think the first alternative is the just view. In the first place, I arrive at that result viewing the matter as one of mere construction of the words used. To say that a person is entitled to a charge "as if the duty had been raised by a mortgage in his favour," seems to me clearly to denote an actual charge and not a faculty to make one. So far from agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, who thinks the words analogous to the words used in the Entail Statutes dealing with the power to charge improvement expenditure, I think they are in direct contrast to them; and the same may be said of the words authorising the charge of widows' and children's provisions. These will be found respectively in the 18th and 21st sections of the Rutherfurd Act,[2] and the words are:—"It shall be lawful for the heir of entail in possession to charge." Under such a form of expression it obviously was a res meræ facultatis. Under the present the natural inference is, I think, the other way.

In the second place, I am assured by those of your Lordships, who are more conversant than I am with the rules of English conveyancing, that there could be no doubt that the words used would create an actual charge on English land. Prima facie, therefore, I think it follows that the same result should be reached in Scotland.

This brings me to the last point on which really the judgment of the Court below turns. Is this question of a "charge" without any provision for its entering the records so repugnant to the law of Scotland as to exclude, so far as Scotland is concerned, the construction which the words would otherwise suggest?

The first and most obvious consideration is that the very same thing is done by the 1st subsection of the same 9th section as regards the whole duty in a question with the Crown.

I do not find that the learned Judges suggest that the charge effectuated by the 1st subsection is a bad charge. I am not overlooking the fact that the words are slightly different—"shall be a charge" instead of "is entitled to a charge." The difference is accounted for by the fact that the nominative in the first sentence is a thing, and in the second a person. But the point, be it remembered, is not, for the moment, construction—it is feasibility. A charge which does not enter the records is, in view of our Scottish system, very inconvenient; but inconvenience is not impossibility. And I do not wonder that the Judges did not express doubts as to the validity of the charge effected by subsection 1, because it is only the echo of the 42d section of the Succession-Duty Act. It is every day practice, in the investigations preparatory to preparing the conveyance following upon a minute or other bargain of sale, to ask for the succession-duty accounts in order to be satisfied that this unrecorded yet possible burden does not affect the lands; and if authority for this statement be needed, it will be found in the instructions to the prudent conveyancer given at p. 721 of the late Mr Montgomery Bell's standard work on Conveyancing, where, after pointing out the possible existence of terce and courtesy (both burdens which do not enter the records), he specially adverts to the burden created by the Succession-Duty Act.

But further, I think, the point is in truth necessarily decided by the case of Laurie,[1] if that case is closely examined. In that case an entail proprietor in possession had paid the estate-duty, and he presented a petition to the Court for authority to charge the estate with a bond and disposition for the amount. In his petition as first presented he founded on the Finance Act alone, and the petition was reported against as incompetent by the reporter appointed by the Court, on the ground that the application clause 23 (18) did not apply, being limited to persons in whom the estate was not vested, and that the statute gave no other warrant for executing a bond and disposition in security.

The petitioner then amended his petition by founding on the 11th section of the Entail Amendment Act of 1868. That section—I paraphrase it for brevity's sake—enacts that when there are entailer's debts or other debts, or sums of money which might lawfully be made chargeable by adjudication or otherwise on the fee of the estate, the Court may on the application of the heir in possession authorise bonds and dispositions in security for the amount to be placed on the estate. Upon this amendment the Court granted the prayer of the petition—the case having been reported by Lord Pearson to the First Division. The point is put clearly and in a single sentence by the Lord Ordinary, when, after quoting the 11th section of the Entail Act as above, he says: "The question is whether the statutory charge held by the petitioner (i.e., in virtue of the 9th section of the Finance Act) is a debt falling within that category. The reporter is of opinion that it is, and I agree with him." This is affirmed by Lord Adam, who gave the judgment of the Inner-House, and who says:[2] "It may be that the Entail Statutes did not contemplate a debt of this nature, but I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that it falls within the description of debts specified by the statute, that the petitioner is creditor in a debt which may be lawfully made chargeable upon the fee of the entailed estate, and therefore that the petition is competent and ought to be granted."

I confess I am utterly unable to reconcile this with the view now taken by the same learned Judge, that the debt itself is a res meræ facultatis. The only warrant for putting in force the 11th section of the Entail Act was the existence of an actual debt, not a facultative power of creating a debt. In other words, Laurie's case[1] in terms decides that an heir of entail who pays the estate-duty is, in virtue of the provisions of the Finance Act, in the position to lead an adjudication. But an adjudication, which is a common law remedy, can only proceed on actual as distinguished from contingent debt.

Accordingly as I think Laurie[1] was well decided, it, in my judgment, rules the present case.

I cannot help adding that I think that much of the difficulty experienced by the learned Judges in the Court below arises from their not having for the moment sufficiently distinguished between the question of whether a thing is a charge, and whether that charge is so perfected according to the forms of conveyancing as to make a marketable security good against all possible competitors. It is in this latter matter that the Scottish system of the records is so important. But the law of Scotland is not strange to rights which are truly consummated, not res mere facultatis, but which yet are not perfected as regards security. A personal title to land is a familiar example. I do not say that the charge here is of that class. What I have said about the Succession-Duty Act points the other way. But for the determination of this case it would be sufficient if the right was of that class, and the whole of the remarks as to the impossibility of a charge which did not enter the records would be beside the mark.

I think there is no room for doubt that the terms of the application clause are defective, with the result that Lord Moray's trustees have in the present case an uncomfortable security. They cannot avail themselves of the procedure in Laurie's case,[1] because they are not heirs of entail in possession, who alone can invoke the aid of the 11th section of the 1868 Act. But they have the benefit of Laurie's[1] judgment in so far as it finds that they, as in right of all the assets of Earl Edmund, are creditors in a debt which may be made to affect the fee by adjudication. Adjudication is not nearly such a complete or comfortable remedy to a creditor as the right of sale under a bond and disposition in security. But it is a remedy, and a remedy, apart from the authority of Laurie's case,[1] clearly, I think, available. I pressed Mr Clyde to say why it was not, and the only answer I understood him to give was that there was no personal debtor in the debt. But that is no answer at all; for, although such proceedings are in modern times rare owing to the practical disappearance of the cumbrous forms of security, adjudication in old days was one of the recognised modes of making effectual a real burden or debitum fundi where also there is no personal debtor in the debt (Stair, iv. 51, 11).

The result of these views is that in my judgment there is no such impossibility in the law of Scotland in holding that a "charge" can be created on land by the words of a statute without executive provisions for enabling it to enter the record, as to force me to withhold from the words what I think is their natural construction.

I am dispensed from considering the alternative view pled. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and judgment given for the Crown.

Macphail (for the respondents).—May I submit, on behalf of the respondents here, that this is not a case in which costs ought to be given against them. Apart from the circumstance that this is really a test case raised by the Crown, the conclusion of the summons is for an account, and when that account is delivered the question as to the marketability of this asset of Lord Moray's will still have to be discussed, and it may turn out that it has not got a marketable value, in which case no duty would fall to be paid. In that view the Crown would have got a valuable judgment with regard to the future; but as far as the respondents here are concerned, they would be simply in the same position as if they had succeeded in resisting this appeal. Therefore I respectfully submit that either no costs should be awarded against the respondents here, or the question of costs should be reserved until it appears what the Crown gets by way of duty. It may get none.

Lord-Adv. Dickson (for the Crown, appellant).—The summons here is in the usual form in which these summonses are brought, namely, calling upon the parties who are liable to pay the duty to lodge an account. The defenders here objected to lodge an account, and therefore the question considered in the Court below and by your Lordships was whether such an account should be lodged, and your Lordships have so decided. The Crown were found liable in costs in the Court below, and I see no reason why the same rule should not apply here as in the Court below.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think so.

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED, that the order appealed from be reversed; and that the respondents do pay to the appellant the costs both here and in the Court below.

Ship—Charter-party—Damages for detention—Charterers' obligation to have cargo ready—Custom of Port.—Under a charter-party dated 30th May 1900, which did not fix the time within which the ship was to be loaded, the s.s. "Ardandearg" was bound to proceed to Newcastle, New South Wales, and there load a cargo of Australian coals "in the usual and customary manner, as ordered by the charterers, which they bind themselves to ship (except in the event of riot, strikes, &c. . . . or any other accidents or causes beyond the control of the charterers, which may delay her loading)." By the custom of the port of Newcastle, of which both parties were aware, a loading berth could not be procured until a coaling order from a colliery was produced. These coaling orders were issued in regular turn. There were no facilities for storing coal at the harbour.

The charterers ordered a cargo of coal from the Lambton Colliery, in the neighbourhood of Newcastle, ten days after the ship was chartered. On 14th July when the "Ardandearg" arrived, two other ships having coaling orders from the same colliery had arrived before her. In consequence of the colliery having only an output of 350 tons per day, the loading of these ships was not completed till 13th August. The "Ardandearg," having then obtained a colliery order and a berth, completed her loading on 23d August and sailed the following day.

Held (rev. judgment of First Division) that the charterers were liable in damages to the shipowners for the detention of the ship, on the ground that there was an absolute obligation on the charterers to have a cargo ready when the "Ardandearg" arrived, and that no facts had been proved to qualify that obligation.

(IN the Court of Session, Jan. 10, 1904, 6 F. 294.)
The pursuers appealed.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Davey.

Ld. Robertson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an action upon a charter-party. The vessel "Ardandearg" was chartered "to proceed to such loading berth as the freighters may name at Newcastle, New South Wales, and after being in loading berth as ordered, to load, in the usual and customary manner, a full and complete cargo of Australian coals, as ordered by charterers, which they bind themselves to ship." Then follow certain exceptions which do not become relevant to this case.

Now, the "Ardandearg" arrived at her destination on 14th July 1900, and was then ready to load her cargo. If the respondents had provided cargo at that date the vessel could have been loaded, and for that purpose would have at once obtained a loading berth. There was no cargo ready for her, however, until 13th August, and even then not enough. She had twice to be moved from her berth under a very reasonable regulation at the port, that a vessel should not be permitted to occupy a berth when not loading, and as there was no coal for her, she had, as I say, twice to be moved, and her loading was only completed by 23d August. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs brought an action for the loss and damage they had sustained in respect of the detention of the "Ardandearg."

Now, it cannot be denied that the merchant is under an absolute obligation to furnish the stipulated cargo, and I do not understand upon what theory the First Division of the Court of Session overruled the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. With great respect to their Lordships, I may say generally that I think there has been some confusion between the supply of a cargo and the obligation to load, and the qualifications thereof.

I am very sorry if any observations of mine or of the late Lord Herschell have been supposed to throw any doubt upon so well-recognised a principle of commercial law as that a merchant is under an absolute obligation to supply the cargo. The case which is supposed to have created the doubt is Little v. Stevenson & Company,[1] and the passage referred to is at p. 116, beginning: "The proposition of law" (that I disputed) was "that a merchant must be always ready with his cargo at all times and in all places, and under all circumstances to take advantage of any such contingency, if it should arise." The passage itself should be referred to, and Lord Herschell's, which is at p. 118, three lines from the bottom: "It is alleged that the obligation existed in point of law, that at all ports, under all circumstances, however unreasonable it might be to anticipate such a contingency, however deficient the quay might be in the means necessary for storing, or protecting, or preserving cargo, whatever difficulties there might be, in short, that was an obligation always resting upon the shipper." I thought then, and I think still, that, to use Lord Herschell's language, such an obligation on the shipper would be most unreasonable.

But what relevancy had such a case to the case before your Lordships? The controversy turns, as the Lord Ordinary finds, upon the true construction of the charter-party in view of the facts as proved.

I also agree with the Lord Ordinary that delay in the loading is one thing, and the failure to provide a cargo to load is another and a very different thing. He found as a fact that the failure of the defenders to perform their primary duty of providing a cargo was the cause of the delay.

I am not quite certain that I understand the second ground upon which it is contended that the ship was liable for delay in arriving at her chartered port. It seems to me that under the circumstances detailed by the master it was quite reasonable for him to do what he did. But, of course, however reasonable, if it were a breach of contract the reasonableness of the master's conduct would be no answer. But I fail to discover where is the contract of which it is a breach. She arrived before the cancelling clause, and I am unable to follow the argument which is supposed to establish her responsibility.

I think it is quite immaterial to discuss cases in which it is either proved or assumed that there are particular circumstances known to both the parties, and with reference to what they may be supposed to contract, which may affect both the providing and the loading of the cargo. It is enough to say that no such question arises here, and I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be restored, and the judgment of the First Division reversed.

Lord Davey.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Lord Ordinary in this case was correct; and I am so well satisfied with the reasons for his opinion given by his Lordship that I should be content simply to express my agreement, were it not that we are differing from an unanimous judgment of the Inner-House.

Lord Pearson has held that the delay complained of was caused, not by the exceptional congestion of shipping, but by the failure of the defenders (the present respondents) to perform their primary duty of providing a cargo, and that there are no clauses in the charter-party which on a sound construction will excuse the respondents for the delay.

In the case of Postlethwaite v. Freeland,[1] Lord Blackburn, in advising this House, said: "I am not aware of any case contradicting the doctrine that in the absence of something to qualify it the undertaking of the merchant to furnish a cargo is absolute." It has been argued that this doctrine was departed from, and the obligations of the shipper or charterer to have his cargo ready were expressed in a less absolute form in some observations of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Herschell in Little v. Stevenson.[2] I do not understand that to be so. I think that what was there laid down must be read with regard to the facts of that case, and that all that was meant was that the shipper's or charterer's obligation is only to have his cargo ready when the ship is ready to receive it in ordinary course, and that he is not bound to be prepared for a contingency or fortuitous circumstance not contemplated by either of the parties.

There is nothing to be found in the charter-party in the present case which, in my opinion, should be held to qualify this absolute obligation of the respondents. The exception of riot, &c., "and other causes beyond the control of the charterers which may delay her loading," in my opinion, applies only to the process of loading the cargo when ready, and not to delay in providing the cargo. It has frequently been laid down, and may be taken to be established law, that the mere existence of circumstances beyond the control of the shipper, which make it impracticable for him to have his cargo ready, will not relieve him from paying damages for breach of his obligation—Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co.[1] and Ford v. Cotesworth.[2]

In Gardiner v. Macfarlane[3] the circumstances were very similar to those in the present case. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) there says[4]:—"I am of opinion that difficulty in obtaining a cargo on account of the output at the colliery which the charterers had selected being restricted is a matter with which the shipowners are not concerned, and that the consequences of any delay arising therefrom must fall on the charterers." I think this is a correct statement of the law, and is applicable to the present case. It has, however, been held that where the cargo is to be provided from a particular place, and the charter has been made in view of circumstances by which, as both parties know, the procuring of a cargo from that place may be delayed, the charterer is excused, and in that case the known causes of delay may be taken into account in considering whether the cargo was furnished within reasonable time—Harris v. Dreesman.[5]

I think that the opinion of the Lord President was founded on some such consideration. His Lordship thought there were circumstances in this case known to both parties which prevented the obligation of the charterers possessing the absolute character alleged. The learned Judge referred to the evidence on cross-examination of Mr Clark, a member of the firm who were managing owners of the vessel and effected the charter-party with the respondents for this voyage. Mr Clark appears to have had some previous experience with regard to sailing ships loading cargoes of coal at Newcastle; but he did not know with what colliery the respondents would make arrangements, and, in fact, he did not know the various collieries at Newcastle, and only knew some of them by name. But even if he must be taken to have known the usual and customary manner or the conditions of loading at the port, that is not the point. The complaint here is, not of delay in loading, but of delay in procuring the cargo. The respondents, it should be added, do not appear themselves to have been aware, when they effected the charter, of any difficulty there might be in procuring the cargo at the colliery they selected.

Aug. 4, 1905. Ardan Steamship Co., Limited, v. Weir & Co.

It is proved by the evidence of the berthing master at Newcastle that he could have given a berth to the "Ardandearg" on 14th July 1900, the day following her arrival in the port, if coal had been ready for her. But it appears that by a very reasonable regulation of the port a vessel is not allowed to occupy a loading berth until she has received a loading order from the colliery. I am not sure that I clearly understand the argument which the respondents found upon this regulation. It seems to be argued that the ship was not ready to be loaded until the cargo was ready for her, and therefore, I suppose, the cargo was provided as soon as she was ready for it, which looks like an argument in a circle. Putting what is in truth the same argument in another way, it is also said that by the regulation "the turn of the colliery" became incorporated in and formed part of "the turn of the port," and therefore that the delay took place from the practice of the port, over which the respondents had no control, and which they had no power to displace, for the benefit of this particular ship. This, I think, is the main ground of Lord Kinnear's opinion.

But, however the argument is put, I cannot accede to it. It appears to me that it is only putting the old question in another way. By whose default was it that the ship did not get a loading order? The answer, in my opinion, can only be that it was the default of the respondents in not providing the cargo when the ship was ready to go on the berth to receive it. It is said that the respondents did nothing unreasonable. Be it so. But through their misfortune (it may be) they have failed to perform their contract with the shipowners. In short, the respondents have not satisfied my mind that it was any part of their contract with the appellants that the latter should await the turn of the colliery or take the risk of the cargo not being ready. And I am of opinion that, in accordance with the authorities which were cited in the course of the argument, the respondents are liable to pay damages to the appellants for the detention of the ship.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the interlocutor of the Inner-House should be reversed, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored, with costs here and below.

Lord James.—I concur in the judgment submitted to the House.

Lord Robertson.—I concur.

"Ordered and adjudged, that the said interlocutor of the First Division of the 19th day of January 1904, complained of in the appeal, be reversed, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Pearson) of the 2d day of April 1903 be restored: And it is further ordered, that the said cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this judgment: And it is further ordered, that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs of the action in the Court of Session, and also the costs incurred by them in respect of the appeal to this House."

Ship—Charter-party—Failure to provide ship—Measure of damage.—Manufacturers of wood pulp at Stocka, Sweden, in January 1900 entered into a charter-party with a British shipowner for the carriage of two cargoes of wood pulp from Stocka to Cardiff, the first to be lifted at Stocka "May (f.o.w.) (first open water), and the second in August/September, owners' option." The ordinary length of the voyage was twenty-two days.

In an action by the charterers against the shipowner for damages for an admitted breach of the contract by the failure of the shipowner to send a ship to Stocka for the second cargo before the last day of September, it was proved that the shipment was intended by the charterers for delivery at Cardiff in implement of a contract of sale between the charterers and Owen, Cardiff, which set forth as the "mode and place of delivery—c.i.f., Cardiff. Time of delivery—in two cargoes, first open water, and August/September 1900." The delivery of the first cargo was duly made, but on 29th September Owen having ascertained that the ship for the second cargo could not sail from Stocka before 12th October, bought in against the charterers the remainder of the wood pulp contracted to be delivered. The charterers paid Owen the loss he had thus sustained, and claimed this sum from the shipowner as the damage sustained by them.

The First Division, construing the obligation in the contract of sale, to deliver c.i.f. Cardiff August/September, to import an obligation to make actual delivery of the cargo at Cardiff before the end of September, held that as by the charter-party the ship was not bound to load at Stocka before the end of September the charterers' failure to deliver the goods at Cardiff by that date was not due to non-implement of the charter-party.

In an appeal by the charterers, held (rev. the judgment) that when the charterers ascertained that the ship could not leave Stocka before 12th October they were entitled to buy in, or to allow their purchaser to buy in, other goods to replace those which could not be delivered in terms of the charter-party; and that the measure of damages for the shipowner's breach of contract was the extra cost thus occasioned.

Opinions that the words in the contract of sale,—"Mode and place of delivery—c.i.f., Cardiff. Time of delivery—in two cargoes, first open water and August/September 1900"—imported an obligation to ship, not to deliver at Cardiff both at first open water, and in August or September.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The appellants, who were pursuers in the action, are a Swedish firm carrying on business as manufacturers of wood pulp at Stocka. They claim damages from the respondents, shipowners at Glasgow, for breach of a contract of carriage.

The contract was dated 20th January 1900. By it the respondents agreed to carry 900-1000 tons (charterers' option) of wood pulp to Cardiff. The cargo was to be lifted in two shipments, one in May f.o.w., the second in August/September (owners' option). The ship was to have liberty to call at any port or ports in any order, to tow and assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property. The owners were to wire shippers of the cargo, Ströms Bruks, Stocka, six days' notice of readiness, also ship's departure from last port.

Ströms Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison.

This contract, it seems, was made by the appellants with the view of enabling them to fulfil a contract, dated 4th December 1899, for the sale and delivery of 900-1000 tons of wood pulp to Thomas Owen & Company, Limited, of Cardiff. The memorandum of sale contained a column of printed notes, opposite which were written particulars of the special terms of the contract. Against the note "Mode and place of delivery" were the words "C.i.f., Penarth Dock, Cardiff," and against the note "Time of delivery" the words "in two cargoes, first open water, and August/September 1900."

The first shipment—a shipment of 500 tons—was made in due course and accepted. The respondents failed to perform their obligations with regard to the second shipment. The breach is not disputed. The only question is what damages, if any, are recoverable under the circumstances of the case.

On 24th September 1900—that is, six days before the end of the month—it became evident that the respondents, who had given no "notice of readiness" or of "ship's departure from last port," were not in a position to fulfil their contract, and consequently that the appellants would not be in a position to fulfil their contract with Thomas Owen & Company by means of the shipment which the respondents had contracted to deliver.

In these circumstances Thomas Owen & Company, who were entitled to claim 400 tons more, bought in against the appellants in several parcels 367 tons of wood pulp for consumption at their works. There seems to be no market for wood pulp at Cardiff. They were, therefore, compelled to purchase, as best they could, in Manchester, Liverpool, and London, and to pay in addition the cost of carriage. It is not disputed that Thomas Owen & Company acted reasonably, and that the pulp required could not have been bought at less cost.

Thomas Owen & Company made a claim against the appellants for £830, 18s. 5d. in respect of the 367 tons which they had bought in. The appellants, as they were bound to do, paid them the amount of their claim. Then the appellants claimed over against the respondents. Their claim was for £715, 8s. 2d. They brought into account the £830, 18s. 5d. which they had to pay Thomas Owen & Company, and also £9, 9s. 9d. for extra freight on the balance of 33 tons which Thomas Owen & Company accepted at a later date, making up the full 400 tons to which they were entitled. On the other hand, the appellants, unnecessarily as it appears, gave credit for £125 as profit on the 100 tons which the respondents were bound to carry, but which the appellants were not bound to deliver. The respondents, however, refused to make compensation for their breach of contract, and then this action was brought.

In the first place, the respondents contended that by the terms of the charter-party damages for breach of contract were limited to the estimated amount of freight on quantity not shipped. Both Courts have rejected this contention, treating the question as settled by authority. On this point I have nothing to add to what was said by the Lord Ordinary and by Lord M'Laren in the Court of Session.

The question as to the measure of damages gave rise to a serious difference of opinion. The Lord Ordinary held the appellants entitled to recover the amount of their claim with costs. In the Court of Session they were only awarded £50 as nominal damages, and ordered to pay substantially the whole costs of the action. The decision proceeded on the ground that in the view of the Court the appellants' contract with the respondents did not happen to coincide exactly with their contract with Thomas Owen & Company. The loss which they sustained was, therefore, it was said, due to their own fault. The true cause of their inability "to make delivery in terms of their contract was that they had not taken the shipowners bound to deliver the cargo within the time prescribed in their contract with Messrs Owen & Company." Lord Kinnear, indeed, went so far as to say that "the one loss had nothing to do with the other."

The learned counsel for the appellants in his opening address referred to the case of Dunlop v. Higgins,[1] and contended that, according to the law of Scotland as explained by Lord Cottenham, a party disappointed by a breach of contract was entitled to compensation on a more liberal scale than would be allowed by the law of England. The case of Dunlop v. Higgins[1] was decided in 1848. Whatever may have been the state of the law at that date, I do not think that the learned counsel succeeded in persuading your Lordships that there is any difference in the law of the two countries at the present time on such a question as that under consideration. The view enunciated by Lord Cottenham is certainly not law in England. Whenever that view has been referred to by counsel as a guide in an English case, it has been unfavourably criticised, and notably by Willes and Crompton, JJ.[2] So far as I could gather from the learned counsel who addressed the House in the present case, Dunlop v. Higgins[1] has rarely, if ever, been cited as an authority in Scotland.

For the decision of the question before your Lordships, it will be enough, I think, to appeal to the rules as to the measure of damages which have been accepted in Scotland as well as in England, asking your Lordships' attention to the position of the litigant parties and the claim which has actually been made.

Your Lordships will observe that this is not a case like many in the books where a carrier is bound to accept the goods, and some unforeseen accident by land or sea has prevented due delivery. It is a case where persons free to contract or not to contract have deliberately made a bargain and deliberately broken it for their own convenience, alleging only by way of excuse that they did not think the consequences would be so serious, and rather blaming the party they have disappointed for not keeping them up to the mark. True it is, they said, you made pressing inquiries as to the fulfilment of the contract, but that means nothing. You "merely requested us to hurry the boat, which is a very ordinary request." Then your Lordships will observe that, although it is not suggested that the respondents knew the particular terms of the bargain with Thomas Owen & Co., they must have known, as every business man in their position would know, that in all probability the goods were being despatched to England in order to fulfil some contract either actually in existence at the time or in immediate contemplation, so that a breach of their contract with the manufacturers in Sweden might cause a breach of contract with some manufacturer or merchant in England, and lead to a claim of damages by him against the shippers of the goods. The respondents, therefore, were certainly not justified in assuming that in the discharge of their obligations punctuality was a matter of little moment.

Now, if the respondents had given timely notice of their inability or unwillingness to perform their contract, the appellants might possibly have secured other means of transport. In that case the measure of damages would probably have been just what was claimed in the case of the thirty-three tons—merely the difference in freight. But at the time when the appellants received notice of the contract having been broken, it would not have been possible for them to get a ship to go to Stocka so as to reach that port by the end of September. "Practically speaking," says Mr Mackintosh, an independent witness who had considerable experience with shipping business in Baltic ports, "it was quite impossible in those days." So the rule laid down in Rice v. Baxendale[1] must be applied. That rule is this: "Setting aside all special damage, the natural and fair measure of damages is the value of the goods at the place and time at which they ought to have been delivered to the owner": per Blackburn, J., O'Hanlan v. Great Western Railway Co.[2] The appellants' claim is made on that footing. All they want is to be protected against loss. Their claim is simply for the extra cost of supplying at the stipulated time and at the agreed place of delivery goods as nearly as possible of the same description and quality as those which the respondents had undertaken to deliver. They do not claim profits. They do not even make any claim for the warehousing and insurance of the goods left on their hands, or for diminution in the value of those goods by reason of the subsequent fall in the market. They actually concede to the respondents the profit on the extra 100 tons, to which, as far as I can see, the respondents can have no possible claim.

In the Court of Session the respondents advanced with success a most ingenious argument. They said, "We have now discovered the exact terms of your contract with Thomas Owen & Co. Those terms did not correspond precisely with the terms of your contract with us. We might have fufilled our contract to the very letter, and still you might have been left in the lurch as regards your contract with Thomas Owen & Co. We might have put off shipping your wood pulp to the very last day in September, and then we might have gone about picking up cargo at various ports in any order we pleased, and thus without deviating from our voyage, as under certain circumstances we were at liberty to do, it might have been rather late in the year before your wood pulp would have been delivered at Cardiff. You have claimed special damages; you have not proved the special damage you allege, and you have not pleaded general damage. So, though we have not thought it worth our while to appeal against the liberal award which has been made in your favour under the head of nominal damages, you are really entitled to nothing at all."

It seems to me that this argument is founded on an inaccurate use, or perhaps I should say a less accurate application, of the terms "special damage" and "general damage." That division of damages is more appropriate, I think, in cases of tort than in cases of contract. "General damages," as I understand the term, are such as the law will presume to be the direct natural or probable consequence of the act complained of. "Special damages," on the other hand, are such as the law will not infer from the nature of the act. They do not follow in ordinary course. They are exceptional in their character, and, therefore, they must be claimed specially and proved strictly. In cases of contract, special or exceptional damages cannot be claimed unless such damages were within the contemplation of both parties at the time of the contract. Now, the appellants are not claiming here exceptional damages. They are claiming nothing but ordinary damages ascertained and limited by the special circumstances of the case. No doubt they are claiming over against the respondents the damages they have had to pay to Thomas Owen & Co. But if there had been no contract at all between the appellants and Thomas Owen & Co., and Thomas Owen & Co. had made a similar contract with some third person who failed to perform his bargain, and Thomas Owen & Co. had bought in against that third person just as they did against the appellants, their purchases would have been the best evidence possible of the measure of damages resulting from the respondents' breach of contract.

I am unable to see what difference it can make whether you claim damages generally and shew that an award of general damages would include and cover a special loss from which you seek relief, or whether you seek compensation for a special loss and shew that the loss would be more than covered or compensated by an award of general damages.

I do not think there is any substance in the respondents' argument.

I prefer to rest my judgment on this broad ground. But I am not satisfied that the appellants have not claimed damages in general terms, if it be necessary for them to do so. The first plea in law seems to be a claim to general damages, and certainly no authority was cited to shew that in such a case as this the Court would refuse to assist the pursuer. Nor am I satisfied that the contract with Thomas Owen & Co. does not correspond exactly with the contract of carriage. There was evidence to the effect that according to mercantile usage the contract with Thomas Owen & Co. being a c.i.f. contract would be satisfied by the delivery of the goods on board ship at Stocka at any time in September. The delivery of the second shipment would thus correspond with the delivery of the first shipment, which was to be "first open water." Certainly, Thomas Owen & Co. seem to have taken that view at first, for on 5th September 1900, they write from Cardiff: "As you are aware the balance of the Ströms sulphite is to be shipped in August/September, and we shall therefore be glad if you will kindly tell us when we may expect the steamer to arrive here." Moreover, their manager in his examination admitted that they would have been satisfied with the shipment if it had been despatched from Stocka before the end of September. I doubt, however, whether the Court could decide that question in this action, and at anyrate I do not think that the Court ought to be astute in defeating an honest claim in favour of persons who have wilfully disregarded their obligations.

I think that the appeal should be allowed, and the judgment of the Lord

Ordinary restored, with costs here and below, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD DAVEY.—The only question on this appeal is the amount of damages payable by the respondents for an admitted breach of contract. The conclusion which I have formed from a consideration of the cases cited at the Bar is that in recent years, at anyrate, the English decisions as to the measure of damages have been followed by the Scottish Courts, but with some elasticity in the application of them; and, if I may respectfully say so, I think it is of great importance that in commercial cases there should be uniformity in the administration of the law.

The learned Judges in the Inner-House agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the respondents, when they entered into the contract of affreightment with the appellants, must be presumed to have contemplated that the appellants were shipping the goods in performance of a contract limited as to time of delivery. And having regard to the evidence as to the character of this pulp business, I see no reason to differ from this conclusion. But the learned Judges differ widely from the Lord Ordinary in holding that the loss for which damages are claimed in the pleadings was not consequent on the respondents' failure to fulfil their contract. If, however, the Lord Ordinary has put the right construction on the contract of the appellants with their purchasers in Cardiff it is not disputed that he is right in his conclusion. The difficulty arises from a cause of which your Lordships have had frequent experience in commercial contracts, namely, the use of a printed form which is not exactly adapted to the particular case without making the necessary alterations. The material words of the contract are—"Mode and place of delivery" (in print), "C.i.f., Penarth Dock, Cardiff" (in writing). "Time of delivery" (in print), "In two cargoes, first open water, and August/September 1900" (in writing). Lord M'Laren says that he is unable to see how these words as regards the second delivery can mean anything but delivery at Cardiff before the end of September. But it is admitted that the words "first open water" mean by a shipment then made, i.e., when the port of shipment is first free from ice, and it is equally easy to say with the Lord Ordinary that the words "August/September" must refer also to a shipment made in either of those months, or (in other words) that the time of delivery is defined by the date of shipment and not by the date of arrival. On the whole, I prefer the construction put upon the words by the Lord Ordinary, and I think that construction is aided by the fact of the contract being "c.i.f." with its recognised legal incidents, one of which is that the shipper fulfils his obligation when he has put the cargo on board and forwarded to the purchaser a bill of lading and policy of insurance with a credit note for the freight, as explained by Lord Blackburn in Ireland v. Livingston.[1] But I think that Mr Hamilton perhaps put his argument too high in treating this consideration as conclusive.

But, I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten that on any view of the contract the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should have been sustained. The learned Judges have not laid down any particular measure of damages, for in the view which they have taken—that the failure of the appellants to fulfil their contract with Messrs Owen was not the consequence of the default of the respondents, as alleged in the condescendence—Lord M'Laren held there was no evidence of any other damages, and gave £50 as an estimated sum for any inconvenience the appellants have been put to, and this was acquiesced in by Lord Kinnear with some misgivings. I cannot agree that there is no evidence upon which the Court could act. I am of opinion that the proper measure of damages would have been the cost of replacing the goods at their place of destination at the time when they ought to have arrived, less the value of the goods in Sweden and the amount of the freight and insurance. There was evidence that it was practically impossible to obtain another vessel to take the goods from Stocka at that time of year, and I think, therefore, that the appellants were justified in buying or (which is the same thing for this purpose) allowing their purchasers to buy in as soon as it was apparent (as it was before the end of September) that the respondents could not perform their contract. And I think that the actual purchases made might properly be taken as evidence of the cost of replacing the goods in Cardiff in the middle of the month of October. On the other hand, the appellants had no other buyers ready to take their 400 tons of pulp, and there was evidence that it would have been a speculative and very risky thing to send that quantity to Cardiff or elsewhere for sale without having secured a purchaser, and that prices subsequently fell. I think, therefore, there was evidence upon which the Court might, without any injustice to the respondents, have found the value of the goods in Sweden with freight and insurance would not exceed the price in Messrs Owen's contract. I am not, therefore, disposed to disagree with the alternative view taken by the Lord Ordinary if his construction of the appellants' contract with the purchasers be not adopted. I should add that I am less impressed by the pleading difficulty than I might have been had I not found that neither the Lord Ordinary nor the Inner-House considered themselves precluded from giving the pursuers damages other than those arising directly out of the contract with Messrs Owen.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Inner-House should be reversed, and that of the Lord Ordinary restored, with costs here and below.

Lord James.—I agree with the judgment submitted to the House by my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten.

Lord Robertson.—I concur.

"Ordered that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary be restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below."

In re LORD KINROSS.

House of Lords—Practice—Peer appearing as counsel in Appeal Cases. —Resolved that according to the present practice there is no reason why a Peer should not be heard as counsel on an appeal at the Bar of the House of Lords; but that this resolution is not intended to apply to the appearing of barristers who are Peers before Committees of the House, or before the House when sitting under the presidency of the Lord High Steward on a criminal case.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury). The Chairman of Committees (The Earl of Onslow). Earl Spencer. Viscount Cross. Viscount Knutsford. Lord Ashbourne. Lord Macnaghten. Lord James. Ld. Robertson.

THIS was an application by Lord Kinross, a member of the Scottish Bar, to be allowed to appear as counsel on appeals to the House sitting as a Court of Appeal.

The Committee for Privileges was summoned to consider the application.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think it right to mention the circumstances under which I have asked that your Lordships should give us your assistance. The son of the late Lord Justice-General of Scotland has been called to the Bar and is a practising barrister. There is a case coming before your Lordships' House in which he is desirous, and his client is desirous, that he should appear and represent him as counsel at the Bar of your Lordships' House. I did not think it was very desirable that without an appeal to your Lordships' Committee we, who are a comparatively small number practically constituting the Court of Appeal, should decide the question as to hearing him for ourselves, because although practically those who are sitting for that purpose are merely a Court of Appeal, theoretically it is your Lordships' House. Therefore I have asked your Lordships' assistance in determining what answer should be returned to the noble Lord who desires to appear as counsel.

I do not conceal that I am myself strongly of opinion that he ought to be allowed to appear. I think the theoretic view that he is a member of your Lordships' House and so a member of the tribunal is not one which ought to prevail in practice. The House when sitting on appeals is confined to the legal members of the House of Lords, including the Lords of Appeal who are appointed for that purpose. A Court of Appeal has been specially constituted, before which no appeal can be entertained unless three of those members are present. Theoretically I can imagine that a good many things might be said against the view which I entertain; but it seems to me that practically the question is not one which ought to create much difficulty. I do not see why a Peer should be precluded from appearing before the final Court of Appeal.

Two things strike one at once with reference to the general question. In the first place, Lord Coleridge, who is a member of this House, is continually practising before the Courts, and therefore it may be assumed that there is nothing in the position of an advocate before the Courts to prevent a Peer from practising at the Bar. Then the question arises, is there anything to exclude him from appearing also before the highest Court of Appeal? Whatever may be said about that now, there is no doubt that in earlier times there was not a strong partition between the Bench and the Bar. If anything is to be said about the traditions of the Bar, my impression derived from the old reports is that in the times of our early legal history a man was one day an advocate and the next day a judge. In fact, when you use the old reports for the purpose of authority, it is difficult, without making some sort of antiquarian inquiry, to ascertain whether or not the words you quote are words of authority coming from one of the Judges, or whether they are merely the argument of counsel which may have been uttered the day before in his capacity as counsel, and not as a Judge at all. From time to time they went from the Bench to the Bar and from the Bar to the Bench during all those years. And then I may refer to the present state of things in the Privy Council. We have a distinguished member of the House of Commons and of the Bar—Mr Asquith—who is also a member of the Privy Council, practising before the Privy Council. It may be said that he is not a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That is true; but it would be strange if that circumstance were to affect the question whether or not he ought to be heard as an advocate before the tribunal. I propose to move, with a view to starting the discussion—That according to the practice of the highest Court of Appeal, the House of Lords, there is no reason why a Peer should not be heard as an advocate to argue questions of law before your Lordships' House.

LORD JAMES.—As one of the older members of your Lordships' Committee, I should like to say, with very great deference, that I entirely differ from the view that has been presented by my noble and learned friend, and I trust your Lordships will consider well before you accept this motion. I am not for a moment suggesting that a Peer should not practise as a barrister in the Courts of law. Until the case of Lord Coleridge occurred the question had never arisen; but it appears to me that the course taken by the noble and learned Lord was perfectly justifiable. If I may say so respectfully, I think the more the members of this House associate themselves with the profession the better. In my opinion Lord Coleridge was well within his right in practising at the Bar. But that is not the question now before your Lordships. The question is, whether a man who is a member of a tribunal can practise before that tribunal. If we accept this motion, that Lord Kinross should be allowed to practise at the Bar of the House, I cannot understand how we can refuse him the right to appear before committees of the House also. I cannot see any distinction, and the very important question arises whether we shall not by giving this permission be encouraging the House of Commons to determine that its members may practise before the committees of that House. There is a very thin partition between practising before committees of the House and before the House generally. What is there to prevent a Peer who practises before the House itself from practising before one of its committees? And let me refer to a recent case. Three or four years ago we had a Peer on his trial for a felony. If this permission is granted, what will there be to prevent a Peer from being heard as an advocate at the Bar and then coming in and taking part in the decision of the very case in which he has been an advocate?

We must not forget that when we are sitting to hear appeals we are sitting as the House of Lords. According to the theory of the Constitution we are the House of Lords, determining the question as such, and whether we sit as a limited number of legal Peers to hear appeals in civil causes, or as a judicial tribunal to determine the guilt or innocence of one of our Peers, we are in any case the highest Court of law in the land. My noble and learned friend's motion involves this, in principle at least, that a member of this House may appear before the House and argue before it, with a right afterwards to take part in the decision. I say that would be a scandal. We have some analogy to guide us upon the principle as to whether a member of a tribunal can practise before it or not. As your Lordships are aware, there was a time when the House of Commons decided upon election petitions by its own committees, but in the year 1868 the determining of those petitions was placed in the hands of the Judges. Then because that tribunal (the Judges) reported to the House of Commons, those who had the care of the interests both of Parliament and the Bar in their hands had to consider whether a barrister who was also a member of Parliament had a right to appear before that tribunal. If I recollect rightly, the determination of that question was chiefly in the hands of Sir John Coleridge and Sir John Karslake, and a few months later, in the spring of 1869, I was a party to it. We determined that no member of the House of Commons should appear before an election Judge, because the election Judge had to report to the House, and therefore the barrister practising before him would be practising before the same tribunal of which he was a member. I may remind my noble and learned friend, who was engaged in nearly all the election petitions until he took his seat in the House of Commons in 1876, that that rule was fully accepted. Some members of the House gave up appearing on a considerable number of petitions, and we maintained the principle that a member of the House of Commons should not practise before the tribunal which would have to report to the House.

One word as to the analogy which my noble and learned friend has spoken of in respect to the Privy Council in the case of Mr Asquith. The rule of conduct was that a barrister should not practise before the Judicial Committee if he became an ordinary Privy Councillor. Sir John Karslake, for one, entertained this view. Acting upon that rule in 1885, when I had the honour of being made a Privy Councillor, I refused to appear before the Judicial Committee because I could not bring myself to practise before that tribunal, although there was a strong partition between the general body of Privy Councillors and the members of the Judicial Committee. That was formerly accepted and acted upon as the proper rule which should guide those who practised before the Privy Council until very recently, and although my friend Mr Asquith has a right to do what he has done—and I have not a right or a desire to criticise him in the least—still there can be no doubt that that right was not acted upon, and had never been acted upon by anyone except Mr Asquith, in the long period which had elapsed before he chose to take that course. For the reasons I have given I am very strongly against breaking down this barrier, which in my opinion rightly exists, preventing any member of a tribunal from practising before it. Although I dare say this motion might not in fact have a wide operation, I feel bound to express my opinion against it in the interests both of the dignity of this House and of the members of the Bar who practise before it.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I must say the inclination of my mind is not in accord with my noble and learned friend Lord James. Nor am I impressed with his arguments, although I recognise their interest and the great fairness with which he has presented them. My noble and learned friend has used an expression to the effect that members of your Lordships' House are members of the tribunal that hears appeals, and indeed he has referred to that fact more than once. It is true only in a historical and remote sense, for in all the years that any of your Lordships now present recall no Peer not learned in the law according to the technical description has attempted to take any part in a decision of your Lordships' House in legal matters. I venture to say that if, when an appeal was being heard in your Lordships' House upon a point of law, any member of the House not learned in the law sought to take part in the proceedings, those who were specially responsible for the legal business of your Lordships' House would feel compelled to animadvert very strongly upon it, if not to adjourn the hearing of the case. I can hardly imagine a step more inconvenient, more entirely opposed to constitutional usage, than for any member, who had not held one of the qualifying offices which would justify him in taking part in hearing appeals, to come here and seek to discuss the important questions of law which are from time to time coming before your Lordships' House. I admit, of course, that the House of Lords is the House of Lords for all purposes, and every member of it is a Peer of Parliament entitled to be present on every occasion when it sits, but I cannot but think it is putting a technical point into undue prominence when you speak of every Peer as being a member of your Lordships' House for the decision of important legal questions.

Then my noble and learned friend says this would be only introductory to wider claims, and if a Peer were permitted to come and appear for a client at your Lordships' bar it would be competent for him then to appear for a client before a committee of the House. I am disposed strongly to question that. No doubt if he were selected by the Lord Chairman of Committees as a member of a committee of your Lordships' House he would be entitled to sit upon that committee. But this is not a matter of technicality, it is a matter of substance. If he sought to appear on behalf of a client before a committee, he might be a member of that committee or a member, if not of that particular committee, of another committee in another room, there being no technical bar against his sitting on a committee. I see therefore a great difference, a vital difference, between practising in your Lordships' House and appearing before a committee, when he might have sat on that very committee or on another committee the day before in another room.

Then my noble and learned friend refers to an assumed analogy between what is sought on the present occasion and the action of the House of Commons in reference to election petitions. I was not myself able to follow that. It is quite true that for purposes deemed wise by Parliament the hearing of election petitions was transferred to the Judges, but the report comes back to the House of Commons, and therefore every member of that House has a right, and if there was a call of the House it would be his duty, to be present at whatever proceeding might take place in reference to that report.

I do not think the analogies and reasons mentioned by the Lord Chancellor have been displaced by what has been said by my noble and learned friend Lord James in his very interesting remarks. The practice of the Privy Council is, I think, important, and has a significant bearing on the present discussion. My noble and learned friend says that when he was made a member of the Privy Council he did not practise before that tribunal, although we all know that he was a very leading and distinguished member of the Bar. But we are aware that a very distinguished and prominent member of the Bar, also a Privy Councillor, now practises there, and no doubt to the assistance of the tribunal and the advantage of his clients. Therefore we find that the existing practice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is not to question the right of the Privy Councillor to appear and argue for his clients in cases in which he may be instructed. I think that is a matter of very considerable importance when we are considering analogies.

My noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has mentioned the fact of Peers practising in other Courts. I think that is a matter of considerable importance. Assuming that he is entitled to be regarded as a member of the House of Lords, and therefore technically within the description of one who could hear appeals, is it not a step in the argument to find that he is allowed without question to discuss and to take part in cases which have come before tribunals lower than that of your Lordships' House? This is a new question; it has never been presented before for decision as regards the Bar of this House or its committees. I admit that there is something in what my noble and learned friend Lord James has said—there are certainly considerations to be weighed on both sides; but I must say that the balance in my own mind is in favour of what has been said by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor.

EARL SPENCER.—I am rather reluctant to say anything among a body almost entirely composed of law Lords, but as this is a matter which affects the House at large perhaps I may have some little right to say something upon it. Probably I am the only lay Peer present to-day who has sat in the House when hearing an appeal. I remember very well when I was a mere boy I was called in one morning to make a quorum, and I recollect sitting here and hearing appeals. Happily that state of things has passed away; it was certainly open to objection, and the doing away with it was, in my opinion, one of the best of reforms. According to the statement we have heard, not only from the Lord Chancellor and Lord Ashbourne, but from Lord James, it is well understood that of late years lay Peers no longer take any part in the procedure of hearing appeals before the highest tribunal of the land.

In re Lord Kinross.

I have listened with the greatest care to the arguments which have been addressed to the House this morning. I confess my sympathy is very strong in favour of making this concession to Lord Kinross. I followed the precedents and analogies which were brought forward by Lord James, and I confess I did not think that some of them exactly applied. One of the strong points he made was with regard to the Privy Council. Lord Ashbourne has met that. It seems to me that the Crown has that matter entirely in its own hands, because until a Privy Councillor is called to sit on the Judicial Committee he is not a member of the tribunal. Then comes the question of practising before committees of this House. I think what is proposed now could hardly be a precedent for that. I at once admit that it is not right that anyone pleading before a tribunal should also sit upon that tribunal as Judge. No doubt any Peer might sit on a committee, but it does not follow that he would be put on a committee by the Lord Chairman. It is not likely that he would put a legal Peer upon the committee if he has been in the habit of practising before committees. The only precedent which certainly does throw a little difficulty in my way is the precedent of the House sitting as it did a few years ago—[1901] A. C. 446; Trial of Earl Russell—when the Lord Chancellor presided over a trial of a Peer for what I may call a criminal offence. There of course the whole House did sit. I remember on that occasion being appealed to by several of my friends and others to make a motion; but I declined to do so, as I thought it was more right that the question should be decided by the Law Lords than by the lay Peers. At the same time there we were, and I should have had a perfect right to make a motion with reference to the sentence. That is a case in which there might be a difficulty. Lord James was present there I think. I was going to throw out this suggestion: Is it possible that in passing the resolution in the Committee of Privileges or in the House that Lord Kinross may practise, to confine it to your Lordships' House when sitting as the highest Court of Appeal? If that could be done, it would sweep away the only difficulty I have.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My motion was so intended.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am very glad that the Lord Chancellor has submitted this question to the Committee for Privileges, and I am very glad to hear the opinion that has been expressed by a member of the House who is not a member of the legal tribunal. I entirely agree with everything the Lord Chancellor has said. One consideration which weighs practically with me a good deal—possibly because I spent a good part of my life at the Bar—is this. If you recognise that a barrister may practise before other tribunals you place him at a great disadvantage if you say he may not appear here, and you place his clients at a great disadvantage also if you say that he may not follow the case when it comes by appeal to this House.

VISCOUNT KNUTSFORD.—I may be allowed to express my complete concurrence in the views which have been stated by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. It seems to me that we are dealing in this case with a matter of substance and not of technicality. There may be difficulties, but substantially there can be no doubt that the Lord who now seeks to appear before you would have no right, and could under no circumstances have a right, to sit also as a member of the Court in the case; therefore he would not be pleading before a Court in which he could be a Judge. That seems to me to be substantially the view of the question we ought to adopt. With the view entertained by Lord Spencer as to defining more clearly in the resolution the particular point we are engaged upon, I desire to express my hearty concurrence, and I understand that the Lord Chancellor agrees to that suggestion.

LORD ROBERTSON.—I merely rise to put one particular point. It is this—I do not see any technical difficulty at all in what is proposed, and for this reason: The suggestion is made that the noble counsel, having pleaded upon his case, could constitutionally come into the House and vote on that very case. That is not so. No man is entitled to sit and take part in a decision in this House or anywhere else unless he has heard the cause, and heard it as a Judge. Now, the Bar is outside the House of Lords altogether. Therefore a Peer who has heard the cause at the Bar has not heard the cause. Consequently that difficulty entirely vanishes. I fully concur with the view taken by Lord Spencer.

LORD JAMES.—Of course I accept the view that has been expressed almost unanimously, adding as a rider to the motion that the resolution is not intended to apply to the appearing of barristers who are Peers before Committees of this House, or before the House when sitting as a full Court in a criminal case.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—With reference to the case of Lord Russell, it was not a trial before this House. It was a trial before the Lord High Steward of England, the House sitting as the Judges of fact. It was not a sitting of the House within the language of my resolution. The resolution I propose is—"That according to the present practice of the House of Lords there is no reason why a Peer should not be heard as an advocate to argue questions of law before your Lordships' House; but this resolution is not intended to apply to the appearing of barristers who are Peers before Committees of this House."

LORD JAMES.—Could we add such words as "or before this House when sitting for the trial of criminal cases"?

LORD ASHBOURNE.—"Or when sitting under the presidency of the Lord High Steward on a criminal case"?

VISCOUNT CROSS.—I agree, subject to the remarks made by Lord Spencer, and now that that point has been met I entirely agree with the motion.

REPORT from the Committee for Privileges:—"That according to the present practice of the House of Lords there is no reason why a Peer should not be heard as counsel on an appeal at the Bar of this House; but that this resolution is not intended to apply to the appearing of barristers who are Peers before Committees of this House, or before this House when sitting under the presidency of the Lord High Steward on a criminal case." Made and agreed to, and resolved accordingly.

JOHN CLARK, Respondent.—Shaw, K.C.—Constable.

No. 1.

Dec. 15, 1904.
Soutar v. Clark.

Statutory Offences—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 49, General Rule 24, and sec. 51 and Special Rules—Mines and Minerals—Winding Engineman—Responsibility of Manager—Person not qualified allowed to work engine for raising material only.—By section 49, General Rule 24, of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, it is enacted that in a coal mine which is usually entered by means of machinery a man not under twenty-two years of age shall be appointed for working the machinery which is employed in lowering and raising persons, and shall attend for that purpose during the whole time any person is below ground in the mine. By the Special Rules in force under section 51 of the Act in a mine usually entered by means of machinery it was provided that the engineman should remain in charge and so near his engine as at all times to have it completely and entirely under his control; should watch and attend to the various signals for raising and lowering the cage whether laden with persons or materials or empty; and (Special Rule 29) should not allow any person to interfere with the engine while being wrought. Section 51 of the Act enacts that the manager of a mine shall be guilty of an offence against the Act unless he proves that he has taken all reasonable means to enforce the rules.

Held that these general and special rules applied when the engine was being used for raising and lowering material as well as when it was being used for raising and lowering persons; and that a colliery manager who had permitted a person under twenty-two years of age to raise material but not persons by means of the winding-engine when it was under the charge of a qualified winding-engineman, had failed to the best of his power to enforce Special Rule 29, and was consequently guilty of a contravention of section 51 of the Act.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord Kinnear.

On a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts brought in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline at the instance of John Shaw Soutar, Procurator-fiscal of Court, John Clark, colliery manager, Milesmark, Dunfermline, was charged with a contravention of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887.*

* The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), under the heading "General Rules" enacts as follows:—Sec. 49. "The following general rules shall be observed, so far as is reasonably practicable, in every mine:— . . . Rule 24. In any mine which is usually entered by means of machinery a competent male person not less than twenty-two years of age shall be appointed for the purpose of working the machinery which is employed in lowering and raising persons therein, and shall attend for Soutar v. Clark.

The complaint set forth that Clark, being manager of Wallsend Pit, of Rosebank Colliery, Dunfermline, in October 1903 found James Hunter, who was employed as fireman at said mine, and who, in respect that he was less than twenty-two years of age, was not qualified to act as a winding-engineman, contravening Special Rule 29 then in force at said mine under section 51 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, by working the engine and so interfering with it while it should have been wrought by George Russell, then employed as winding-engineman at said mine; and again found Hunter contravening Rule 29 in a similar manner in November 1903 while the engine should have been wrought by Robert Moodie, then employed that purpose during the whole time that any person is below ground in the mine."

Sec. 51, under the heading "Special Rules," enacts as follows:—"(1) There shall be established in every mine such rules (referred to in this Act as special rules) for the conduct and guidance of the persons acting in the management of such mine or employed in or about the mine as, under the particular state and circumstances of such mine, may appear best calculated to prevent dangerous accidents, and to provide for the safety, convenience, and proper discipline of the persons employed in or about the mine. (2) Such special rules, when established, shall be signed in duplicate by the inspector who is inspector of the district at the time the rules are established, and shall be observed in and about every such mine (including any extension thereof) in the same manner as if they were enacted in this Act. (3) If any person who is bound to observe the special rules established for any mine acts in contravention of or fails to comply with any of them, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and also the owner, agent, and manager of such mine shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing, and to the best of his power enforcing, the rules as regulations for the working of the mine so as to prevent such contravention or non-compliance."

The special rules in force at Wallsend Pit, Rosebank Colliery, in terms of section 51 of the Act, inter alia, provided as follows:—"Manager.—(2) Generally the mine shall be under the control, management, direction, and supervision of the manager, whose duty it shall be to carry out and see carried out the various provisions of the Act so far as incumbent on him, or on those acting under his control and directions. . . . He shall also appoint such competent persons as may be required for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the statute. . . . Winding-Engineman.—(20) The engineman at the pithead shall during the hours of his shift remain in charge of and so near his engine as at all times to have it completely and entirely under his control. (21) He shall attend for the purpose of lowering and raising persons in the mine during the whole time that any person is below ground in the mine. . . . (27) He shall thoroughly acquaint himself with and shall watch and attend to the various signals made for raising or lowering the cage, whether laden with persons or materials, or when empty. He shall carefully and exactly stop the cage at the landing-places. He shall observe the indicator attached to the machinery shewing the position of the load in the shaft, and manage the brake connected with the engine. He shall further attend to and see that the indicator shews the position of the cage in the shaft, and that the indicator, brakes, and other fittings of the engine, and any steam and water gauges and safety-valves attached to the steam-boilers are kept in good order. . . . (29) He is prohibited from allowing any person whatever to interfere with the engine in any way while being wrought, and from allowing or permitting any person other than those authorised by the owner, agent, manager, under-manager, or oversman, to enter or remain in the engine-house. . . ."

as winding-engineman at said mine; but that Clark failed on these occasions to prohibit Russell and Moodie from so employing Hunter as their substitute to work said engine, and failed to prohibit Hunter from so acting as their substitute; and that consequently Russell, in October 1903, and Moodie, from November 1903 till May 1904 inclusive, continued illegally so to employ Hunter, and Hunter continued illegally so to act, at intervals on each working day during said periods, and in particular on 14th May 1904; that therefore, Clark having during said period failed to the best of his power to enforce said special rule, and having failed to prohibit Russell, and Moodie, and Hunter, from acting as above set forth, did contravene section 51 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and Special Rule 29, by having failed to the best of his power to enforce the same so as to prevent contravention of or non-compliance therewith, and was liable to a fine, and in default of immediate payment, to imprisonment.

The following objections were stated to the relevancy of the complaint:—"(1) That it charges the manager with allowing the fireman to work the winding-engine, he being, because less than twenty-two years of age, not qualified to act as a winding-engineman, whereas such age limitation under general rule 24 applies only where the machinery is being used for raising or lowering persons; (2) The complaint does not aver that when the fireman was working said machinery it was being used for raising or lowering persons; and (3) That under Special Rule 2 the manager is entitled to appoint 'any competent person' to assist the winding-engineman in his duties except as regards his duty of raising or lowering persons."

The Sheriff-substitute (Shennan) repelled these objections.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and evidence was led.

The Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the proof adduced, found the complaint not proven.

The Procurator-fiscal appealed upon a stated case.

The stated case set forth as follows:—"The following facts were admitted or proved:—(1) That the respondent was, as charged, manager of the mine, and bound to enforce the Act and rules established under it for said mine, and that he had also under his charge two other mines; (2) that in October 1903 Russell was winding-engineman at the mine, and the respondent was informed by the oversman that on one occasion Hunter had been working the engine while drawing material during Russell's shift, and the respondent found fault with that having been done without his permission; (3) that between October 1903 and May 1904 Moodie was winding-engineman at the mine, and the respondent on one occasion saw Hunter working the engine, and again found fault with this being done without his permission, and at the same time made it clear that Hunter must not on any account draw men, but he did not expressly prohibit him from drawing material; (4) that on both occasions Hunter was under the supervision of the engineman; (5) that, during the period charged, Hunter, at intervals on each working day or thereby, assisted Moodie by working the engine for the purpose of raising material only, but that (except on the two occasions mentioned) the respondent did not know that Hunter was so acting; (6) that there were persons below ground in the mine when Hunter worked the engine; (7) that Hunter did not on any occasion lower or raise persons; (8) that in the course of his duty as fireman, Hunter had occasion to go into the engine-house to report to the engineman;

Soutar v. Clark.

(9) that the mine is usually entered by means of machinery, and Hunter is less than twenty-two years of age; (10) that the special rules produced were in force at said mine as charged, and that the respondent published them; (11) that the Enginekeepers' Society, of which a print of the rules is produced, exists for the purpose, inter alia, of affording instruction to apprentices in the system of engine-keeping; that Hunter's father is a winding-engineman; that Hunter intends to be a winding-engineman after he has reached twenty-two years of age; that he has been authorised by the society, in terms of Rule V., to receive instruction, and he had acted, before he came to Wallsend Pit, in the same way as he acted at that pit; (12) that the respondent believed that he was entitled, under Special Rule 2, to authorise any person whom he might consider competent, even though not twenty-two years of age, to work the winding-engine, so long as he did not lower or raise persons; and that this was in accordance with the practice of other colliery managers; (13) that the respondent considered Hunter to be a person competent, notwithstanding his age, to lower or raise material, and, if he had considered it necessary to give the engineman assistance in so doing, Hunter is the man whom he would have authorised to work the winding-engine for that purpose.

"On these facts I held that it was not necessarily a contravention of either the general or the special rules for the working of the mine for Hunter to assist the engineman to raise or lower material, and that therefore the respondent's knowledge of Hunter having so acted on two occasions, without expressly prohibiting him from doing so in future, did not imply that the respondent had failed to enforce these rules. Accordingly I found the complaint not proven."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Is the complaint relevant? (2) Is a colliery manager, who allows or permits a person under twenty-two years of age, in the circumstances set forth in the above findings, to raise material by means of the winding-engine when it is under the charge of a winding-engineman, guilty of failing to the best of his power to enforce section 51 of said Act and said Special Rule No. 29, so as to prevent contravention of or non-compliance therewith? (3) On the facts stated was the respondent rightly acquitted?"

Argued for the appellant;—By the rules in force at this mine it was provided that the winding-engineman should at all times have the engine completely and entirely under his control. No distinction was made between raising and lowering material and raising and lowering persons. Complete and entire control meant personal and exclusive control. The engineman was prohibited from allowing any person whatever to interfere with the engine (Special Rule 29). The appellant here had allowed a person under twenty-two, who was not and could not be a qualified winding-engineman to work the engine. He was consequently guilty of a contravention of section 51 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act. The expression in section 49, "so far as is reasonably practicable," only applied to the case of engineering and mining difficulties.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The purpose of these rules was to safeguard persons. That purpose was not frustrated by allowing an apprentice to work the engine when it was being used for materials only, and under the personal superintendence of the winding-engineman. Some means must be provided for training future winding-enginemen. General Rule 24 applied only to the working of the engine when it was being used for persons. Special Rule 21 shewed that these rules were intended to apply only to the raising and lowering of persons. But apart from this there was nothing in the rules which, properly construed, prohibited the engineman from having the aid of a competent assistant acting under his directions. Special Rules 20 and 27 were sufficiently complied with if the winding-engineman was present, and superintending, although be allowed an assistant as his hand actually to work the engine. The appellant had to read in the words "personal and exclusive" before "control," which was not legitimate. Special Rule 29 referred to interferences by outsiders, not to assistance given by an authorised and competent assistant, The Court was not bound to construe these rules literally, but in a reasonable spirit, and in such a way as to facilitate the working of the mine, provided nothing was done which could endanger life and limb. The general rules only applied so far as was reasonably practicable—sec. 49.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is a proceeding under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. It comes before us in the form of a stated case, and the questions put are these—(His Lordship read the questions).

Under the Act there are general rules and special rules. General Rule 24 provides—(His Lordship read General Rule 24). Section 51 of the Act provides—(His Lordship read section 51). Special Rule 29 established at this pit under this section provides—(His Lordship read Special Rule 29).

In this case the complaint is that the accused, the manager of the pit, failed to prohibit a man of less than twenty-two years from working the winding-engine, and so interfering with it, and so contravened section 51 and Special Rule 29 by failing to enforce the same.

In this case the Sheriff-substitute has found that the respondent believed that he was entitled to authorise a person under twenty-two years of age to work the engine so long as he did not lower or raise persons, and that this was in accordance with the practice of other colliery managers. But that is not enough, because, if practice is to be recognised as modifying the provisions of the statutory rules, variety and uncertainty will be introduced into the law. The question is whether what was allowed to be done here was in conformity with the statute and the rules. The rules are peremptory, and I cannot conceive of any enactments which require more strict and loyal obedience. If these rules are peremptory and must be literally obeyed, I think it is clear that Special Rule 29 was not obeyed in this case, and that the accused failed to do his best to enforce it. If that is so, then the first and second questions will be answered in the affirmative, and the third question will be answered in the negative.

LORD ADAM.—(After stating the charge and the facts found)—On these facts, having regard to the general and special rules applicable to this pit, was it legal to allow Hunter, being a man under twenty-two years of age, to work the winding-engine whether for raising or lowering persons or material? It is admitted that the respondent had no right to allow him to work it for raising or lowering persons. But it is said that it was competent and legal and admissible to allow him to work it so long as it was being used for raising and lowering material only.

Soutar v. Clark.

Special Rule 29 in force at this pit says—(His Lordship read the rule). Now, Hunter did interfere with the engine, and it is said it was a breach of this rule for the manager not to prohibit him from doing so. The way in which the manager is reached is under section 51, subsection (3), of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which enacts—(His Lordship read the subsection). So the charge here comes to be that Clark has not proved that he had taken all reasonable means to prevent contravention of Rule 29. There could be no doubt, if it was a breach of that rule to allow Hunter to work the engine when it was being used for material only, then the manager did not do his best to enforce the rule. The question is whether it was a breach. That depends first on General Rule 24—(His Lordship read General Rule 24). It is to be observed that a competent engineman not less than twenty-two is to be appointed for the purpose of working the machinery, not while it is employed, but "which is employed" in lowering and raising persons. Then there are the Special Rules established under section 51, which are to be observed in the same manner as if they were enacted in the Act. I cannot see why these rules are to be construed otherwise than according to their literal sense. The duties of the winding-engineman are prescribed by Special Rules 20, 21, and 27—(His Lordship read Special Rule 20). I fail to see how he could at all times have the engine completely and entirely under his control when he placed it in charge of an assistant when it was raising and lowering material. That is not retaining the engine under his control. It may be that Hunter, his assistant, was under his control, but that is a different thing. Then Special Rule 21 provides—(His Lordship read Special Rule 21). That rule does not mean that the engineman is to attend while someone else works the engine. Then Special Rule 27 provides—(His Lordship read Special Rule 27). No distinction is made in that rule between persons and material. The engineman, and no one else, is to do the things prescribed whether the engine is being used for persons or for material. The object of these rules is no doubt the safety of the miners. But the person who framed these rules may have thought that a fully qualified engineman was as necessary in the case of material as in the case of persons in order to secure safety. I can see that to allow an unqualified engineman to raise or lower material might be a great danger to the lives of those in the pit.

I think, therefore, that to allow Hunter to work the engine, even when it was being used for material only, constituted a breach of Special Rule 29, and consequently I agree that the questions should be answered as proposed by your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The complaint made against this coal-mine manager is that he failed to the best of his power to enforce the rules in force at this mine. The particular rules which he is said to have failed in enforcing are rules which in effect provide that no one is to take charge of a winding-engine except a competent male person not less than twenty-two years of age, and the contravention alleged is that a lad under twenty-two was allowed to work the winding-engine at this pit. The defence is that under the rules the accused was entitled to allow a person whom he considered competent, even although under twenty-two, to work the winding-engine so long as it is raising or lowering materials only and not persons. The question is whether this is the true construction. I agree that it is not.

The question turns in the first place on the meaning of General Rule 24. That rule provides, in the first place, that a competent male person not less than twenty-two shall be appointed for the purpose of working the machinery. I cannot find in the rule any expression or implication of a distinction between the two operations to which the machinery may be applied of raising and lowering materials and raising and lowering persons. There is no limitation to the case where the machinery is being used for any particular purpose. A competent male person not less than twenty-two is to be appointed for the purpose of working it whatever use it is put to. Then, in the second place, the rule provides that the person so appointed shall attend for that purpose during the whole time that any person is below ground in the mine. That rule having prescribed that a competent person is to be appointed and to attend, we must go to the special rules to see what are the special duties of the person so appointed. The special rule said to have been infringed is the 29th, and, if it stood alone, there might be some room for Mr Shaw's ingenious argument that it does not refer to persons working the engine but to outsiders. But it must be read along with Special Rules 20, 21, and 27. If it is so read it is clear that it is only a negative regulation to bring out more clearly the meaning of the previous positive regulations, which leave no room for Mr Shaw's interpretation. Special Rule 20 provides that the engineman is to remain in charge of, and so near his engine, as to have it completely and entirely under his control. I cannot accept the view that this rule is observed by a person who puts his engine out of his control and allows another person to work it. The respondent does not contend that he would be authorised to do so if the engine was being used for raising or lowering persons, but that it is otherwise when it is being used for materials. But what is meant by having an engine completely and entirely under control cannot possibly depend upon whether the person who controls it is using it for bringing up persons, or for bringing up material from a mine. A difference in the use makes no distinction in the person of the controller. This is confirmed by Special Rule 27, which contains special regulations as to the working of the engine whether it is being used for materials or persons. (His Lordship read Special Rule 27.) The engineman has all these duties to perform whether the cage is used for persons or materials or is empty. Whenever the engine is in operation he is charged with all these things. I therefore infer that whenever the cage is being raised or lowered, for whatever purpose, the engineman himself is to remain in charge. It is not a due compliance with these regulations for the engineman to remain and see what a lad under twenty-two appointed to assist him is doing. If he does so, there is a violation of the rules, and if the manager allows him to do so he fails to enforce the rules. I therefore agree that we must answer the questions as proposed by your Lordship.

THE COURT answered the first and second questions in the affirmative, and the third in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

Dec. 15, 1904. Todrick v. Dennelar. PAUL DENNELAR, Respondent.—Munro.

Complaint—Relevancy—Specification—Statutory Offence—Motor Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), sec. 1, subsec. (1).—A complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts set forth that the accused, time and place libelled, "did drive a motor car on" a highway libelled, "negligently, whereby said car came into collision with a horse and van which was then on said highway, contrary to the Motor Car Act, 1903, section 1." The Sheriff-substitute dismissed the complaint as irrelevant in respect that there was no specification of the modus of negligence. On appeal held that no further specification of modus was necessary, and that the complaint was relevant.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord Kinnear.

PAUL DENNELAR, motor car driver, Salton Hall, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Haddington at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, which libelled that the accused "on 9th September 1903, on the public highway leading between Beltonford and Broxburn, and particularly at a part thereof in the parish of Dunbar near to Eweford Farm Cottages, did drive a motor car on said highway negligently, whereby said car came into collision with a horse and van driven by James Millar, vanman, Hardgate Street, Haddington, which was then on said highway, contrary to the Motor Car Act, 1903, section 1."*

Counsel for the accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint in respect there was no specification of the modus of negligence libelled. The Procurator-fiscal maintained that there was sufficient specification.

The Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) sustained the objection, and in respect of the want of specification dismissed the complaint.

The Procurator-fiscal appealed upon a case stated.

The question of law in the case was,—"Is the complaint relevant?"

Argued for the appellant;—This would have been quite a sufficiently specific averment of a charge of culpable, reckless, and furious driving at common law.[1] The fact that this was a charge under the Motor Car Act, 1903, made no difference as regarded the specification required.

Argued for the respondent;—This was a statutory offence. Where a statute described an offence in general terms, such as driving negligently—the words used in the section libelled here—it was well settled that it was not sufficient in a complaint or indictment merely to echo the general words of the statute, and the modus in which the offence has been committed must be stated.[2] The offence of driving negligently might be committed in many different ways, for example,

* The Motor Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. c. 36), sec. 1, subsec. (1), enacts,—"If any person drives a motor car on a public highway recklessly or negligently, or at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the nature, condition, and use of the highway, and to the amount of traffic which actually is at the time, or which might reasonably be expected to be, on the highway, that person shall be guilty of an offence under this Act."

by excessive speed, failure to give warning of approach, being on the wrong side of the road, not having the machine under control, or not keeping a good look-out. It was no hardship on the prosecutor to compel him to say which kind of negligence he was going to prove, and it was only fair that the accused should know what exact kind of negligence he was to be charged with, and what he would have to meet. It was plain that if this had been a civil action for damages this averment would have been irrelevant as wanting in specification. If such complaints as this were allowed to pass a person might be convicted for what was clearly no offence in law at all, and yet he could not suspend the conviction. In the cases quoted for the Crown it was plain that the nature of the negligence alleged was undue speed and furious driving.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This appears to me to be a perfectly relevant complaint, and to give sufficient notice to the accused of the charge to be brought against him.

Formerly there were many technical rules of pleading which were stringently insisted on, but these are not very much approved of now.

All that is now required of the allegations made against the accused in a complaint is that they aver in a fair and reasonable manner the nature of the offence with which he is charged.

I think in this case that for all purposes of notice—which is the main purpose of pleading—this complaint is sufficiently specific.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It is a question of circumstances in all cases whether sufficient notice has been given to enable an accused to prepare his defence. All that is required for that purpose is stated here—the time, the place, and the offence charged.

It is said that "negligent driving" is the only thing charged, and that the prosecutor has failed to aver wherein the negligence consisted—whether in excessive speed, or in failing to keep a proper look-out, or in being on the wrong side of the road.

I think it was not necessary for him to do so.

I think that in this case sufficient notice has been given, and that therefore the question should be answered in the affirmative and the case remitted to the Sheriff to proceed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the affirmative, sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed as accords.

—To entitle a Sheriff or Magistrate to dispose of a summary complaint in the absence of the respondent in terms of sec. 7 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, it is necessary that he should have proof that the respondent has been duly cited. The execution of citation lodged with the Sheriff-clerk will not be regarded as satisfying the condition when it is not noted on the record of the proceedings as having been produced in evidence.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord Kinnear.

FREDERICK POWDRELL, designed as residing at 39 Marischal Street, Aberdeen, master of the steam-trawler "Roslin," A. 8, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Lerwick on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, at the instance of James Kirkland Galloway, Procurator-fiscal of Zetland, with a contravention of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, whereby he was alleged to have rendered himself liable to a fine, and failing payment to imprisonment.

On 23d July 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Moffatt) granted warrant to cite the accused to appear at Lerwick on 2d September.

On 2d September the Sheriff-substitute in the absence of the accused adjourned the diet till 14th September, ordained the accused then to appear, and appointed the Prosecutor to intimate the adjourned diet to the accused.

The record of the procedings on 14th September bore:—"At Lerwick, 14th September 1904,—In presence of Alexander Moffatt, Esq., Advocate, Sheriff-substitute of Caithness, Orkney, and Zetland, at Lerwick.—Appeared the complainer; the said Frederick Powdrell, having been called, failed to appear. "Lerwick, 14th September 1904.—The Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the evidence adduced, convicts the said Frederick Powdrell of the contravention charged, and therefore decerns and adjudges the said Frederick Powdrell to forfeit and pay the sum of £60 of fine, payable to the Procurator-fiscal of Court"; or to be imprisoned for thirty days.*

* The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), enacts, section 7—"If the respondent after being cited shall fail to appear at the time and place mentioned in the warrant of citation, it shall be lawful for the Court, upon proof that the respondent has been duly cited, to issue a warrant in the second instance for his apprehension and interim detention, or the Court may adjourn the hearing to a future diet, with liberty to the respondent to appear at such adjourned diet, and may in its discretion appoint intimation of such adjourned diet to be made to the respondent; and in cases where the complaint concludes for a pecuniary penalty only in the first instance, or where the Act of Parliament founded on authorises procedure without the presence of the respondent, the Court may without adjourning proceed to hear and dispose of the complaint in the absence of the respondent." Section 16—"It shall not be necessary in any proceeding under the authority of this Act to record or to preserve a note of the evidence adduced, but the record shall set forth in the form of the Schedule I. to this Act annexed the respondent's plea, if any, the names of the witnesses, if any, examined upon oath or affirmation, with a note of any documentary evidence that may be put in."

Schedule I. annexed to the Act is as follows:—"Minute of procedure at the hearing . . . 2. When the respondent is absent.

No. 3.

Dec. 15, 1904. Powdrell v. Galloway.

Powdrell brought a suspension.

The complainer averred, inter alia;—(Stat. 4) "At said diet on 14th September 1904 no evidence was led before the Sheriff-substitute to prove that the complainer had been duly cited."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) No proof having been led before the Sheriff-substitute in terms of section 7 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, to shew that the complainer had been duly cited, the whole proceedings at the diet on 14th September 1904 were inept, and the said sentence or conviction ought to be suspended.

The respondent stated, inter alia;—(Ans. 4) "The proceedings at said adjourned diet are referred to, and explained that the executions of service of said complaint for both diets were duly lodged. Quoad ultra denied."

The respondent admitted that in fact the complainer had not been served personally, and that a copy of the complaint was not left at his address as given in the complaint, but the respondent averred that service of the complaint for both diets had been duly made at another address in Aberdeen, which he alleged was the complainer's usual place of abode for purposes of citation. In these circumstances the suspension also raised the question whether in fact the complainer had been duly cited. But this question was not decided by the Court.

Argued for the complainer;—It was a condition precedent of adopting any of the courses authorised by sec. 7 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, that there should be proof of citation. Schedule I. (2) of the same Act also shewed that where the accused was absent such proof was essential. In this case the record of proceedings did not state that the accused had been duly summoned, the words "after having been duly summoned" (given in Schedule I. (2)), having been omitted. The Sheriff had no proof before him that the accused had been duly cited. It was said that the executions of citation had been lodged. But there was no note in the record of the executions of citation having been produced. If the executions were produced this was contrary to section 16 and Schedule I. (note). If they were not laid before the Sheriff, as in fact they were not, then there was no sufficient proof of proper citation. The executions were necessary productions, and required to be produced and noted on the record, although by themselves they were not sufficient proof that the accused was duly cited. As it did not appear on the face of the record that there had been any proof that the accused had been duly cited the suspension should be sustained.

Argued for the respondent;—The executions of citation, which had been duly lodged, if uncontradicted—and they could only be contradicted on the ground of falsehood—were sufficient evidence of due citation. But the executions of citation did not require to be noted as productions on the record. Section 16 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, only applied to documentary evidence produced in proof on the merits, and not to documentary evidence of the complained against having failed to appear, after having been duly summoned.

"The witness [or witnesses] after named was [or were] examined in support of the complaint, viz.—

"[Note also any productions]."

preliminary procedure having been in order, which was in process. Schedule I. shewed that the noting of documents produced was to be after evidence had been led. The executions of citation were documents which had to be put in, and to have all their effect, before evidence was led at all.

LORD ADAM.—The suspender in this case is a seaman to trade and master of a steam-trawler, against whom the Procurator-fiscal of Zetland brought this complaint, on the ground that he had contravened the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, by using an otter trawl within three miles of the shore at a point off the island of Foula. That is the complaint, and upon hearing evidence the Sheriff, upon 14th September 1904, pronounced an interlocutor in which he convicted the said Frederick Powdrell of the contravention charged, and sentenced him to pay a fine of £60 or be imprisoned for thirty days in default of payment.

That is the charge in the complaint, and that is the sentence which the complainer seeks to have set aside on one or other of two grounds. The first of these is founded on the provision of section 6 of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, which requires citation of a party, who cannot be personally cited, by leaving a copy of the complaint "at his usual place of abode." Now, the determination of the question so raised depends on a matter of fact about which the parties are not agreed, and taking the view I do on the second ground pleaded for this suspension it is unnecessary for us to come to any decision on this.

The second objection arises out of what took place at the hearing of the case. This was a proceeding in the absence of the respondent, and section 7 of the Summary Procedure Act which applies to such a proceeding enacts —"If the respondent after being cited shall fail to appear at the time and place mentioned in the warrant of citation it shall be lawful for the Court, upon proof that the respondent has been duly cited," to do certain things, including adjournment to a future diet, or in certain cases to proceed in the cause in absence of the respondent. From the minute of proceedings in the present case we find that the procedure followed was that the Sheriff on 23d July 1904 signed the warrant for service of the complaint on the respondent, citing him to appear personally on 2d September. On the latter date the case appears to have been called, and we are told the respondent did not appear, whereupon the Sheriff adjourned the diet to the 14th day of September, and appointed the complainer to intimate that diet to the respondent. That seems to be objected to as incompetent on the ground that the respondent not having been duly cited, or there being no proof that he had been duly cited, it was incompetent for the Sheriff to adjourn the diet in a proceeding that had not been properly brought before him. I agree that the proceeding was incompetent if the respondent had not been duly cited, but if he was duly cited and failed to appear it appears to me that the procedure was quite competent. All that the section requires to be done to justify an adjournment was done, and an intimation was ordered to be given to the respondent of the time and place of the adjourned diet. It is said that this should only have proceeded upon proof that the first citation had been duly made. I am unable to sustain that objection.

But now we come to the procedure at the hearing of the case at the adjourned diet, which is a more serious matter. What took place, we are told on the record, was this—"The said Frederick Powdrell having been called failed to appear." Then certain names of witnesses are recorded. Then a note is given of certain charts which were produced. These two charts are the only documents noted, and no mention is made of the execution of citation having been produced as evidence in the case. Then follows the conviction and sentence complained of.

Dec. 15, 1904. Powdrell v. Galloway.

Now, looking to the terms of the section, I should have thought that the first thing to do was to call the respondent to appear and answer the complaint in terms of the citation. If he did not appear, then the section says what must be done to entitle the Sheriff to try the cause as a cause in absence—"upon proof that the respondent has been duly cited." The suspender says that no such proof was led, and it is answered for the prosecutor that the execution of citation was lodged in the process, and that that was sufficient proof of the fact. Now, it is a curious fact in this case that the prosecutor in answer nowhere avers that any proof was led before the Sheriff as to the fact of citation. The averment by the suspender is quite definite. "At said diet on 14th September 1904 no evidence was led before the Sheriff to prove that the complainer had been duly cited." To that very distinct averment the only answer made is—"The proceedings at said adjourned diet are referred to, and explained that the executions of service of said complaint for both diets were duly lodged; quoad ultra denied." Not a word about their having been shewn to the Sheriff before he was asked to proceed in the absence of the respondent, and I have come to the conclusion that all that the prosecutor can aver is this, that the executions of citation were duly lodged with the Sheriff-clerk, but there is nothing at all to shew that these executions of citation were ever produced in evidence or shewn to the Sheriff. That might have been sufficient proof of citation to satisfy the requirements of section 7—I say nothing as to that—but it does not help the prosecutor in this case, as it only brings him against the provisions of the 16th section and relative schedule of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, which require all documents produced in evidence to be noted on record. Now, that has again and again been held to be an imperative provision. We may have held that certain papers, such as notes used by a witness, or bank notes which had been stolen, were not documents produced in evidence, but we have nothing of that nature here. These executions of citation if put in as proof of citation, and indeed they appear to have been the only proof offered, were most essential documentary evidence in the case. According to my reading of the section, the Sheriff could not proceed a step in trying the case in absence without having led before him proof that the respondent had been duly cited to appear. But it is sufficient for the decision of this case that an essential document produced in evidence has not been noted in the minutes of proceedings.

Even if it be true that the suspender knew he was cited, and being cited chose to stay away, that would not be sufficient, in the view I take of this statute, to sustain a conviction in absence where there had been no proof led before the Sheriff that the accused was in fact duly cited. It is quite another matter where a party being duly cited chooses to stay away, and the prosecutor proceeds in terms of the statute to prove that citation was duly made, and a conviction follows proceedings ex facie regular. Here that has not been done, and even assuming that the suspender was duly cited, that fact does not appear ex facie of the record to have been proved in the case, and therefore the conviction cannot be sustained.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. It is extremely important that proceedings against persons accused of an offence should not be allowed to go on in the absence of the accused unless it is proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff or Magistrate that the complainer has been duly cited in terms of the statute.

Now, here the record does not shew that the Sheriff has taken the first step required to satisfy himself of the fact of the service of the complaint by calling for the execution of citation. If this had been done, and he had been satisfied by the execution of citation, this ought to have been noted on record. The record contains no note that the execution of citation was produced in evidence. Apart from that we find no note in terms of Schedule I. that the respondent "failed to appear after having been duly summoned." The note merely bears that "Frederick Powdrell having been called failed to appear." This statement does not shew that the Sheriff had been satisfied that citation had been duly made before he proceeded to hear the case in absence. It is said that we must take it that the execution of citation was in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk and that it was in order. But it is the Sheriff, and not the Sheriff-clerk, who has to be satisfied. I agree that the execution of citation was a document which if produced in evidence required to be noted on record.

I also agree that the question of fact as to whether or not citation was duly made is not before us in this suspension in a form which enables us to decide it. It does suggest itself to my mind that if the execution of citation had in fact been brought to the notice of the Sheriff, and his attention called to the discrepancy between the place of citation and the residence of the accused libelled in the complaint he might have been led to consider whether it was advisable to proceed with the case in the absence of the accused or whether further inquiry should be made to secure that the accused knew of the citation.

The LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Pass the bill: Suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern."

the sentence implemented. The complainer explained that he had objected to the relevancy of the charge, and that the first six months of the delay was due to his having waited for the result of an appeal to the High Court in another case, raising the same question, which was not decided until five months after his conviction, and that the subsequent delay was due to the fault of the Police Court officials.

The Court refused the bill.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Adam. Lord Kinnear.

JAMES KELLY, residing at 15 St Mary Street, Edinburgh, was charged in the Police Court, Edinburgh, under a summary complaint, at the instance of Robert Macaulay Smith, prosecutor for the public interest, with a contravention of section 284 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879.[1]

The complaint set forth that the accused, contrary to the section libelled, between the dates libelled, "was the keeper, or a person having the care or management, of premises situated at 15 St Mary Street, Edinburgh, which premises, or a passage or place there," the accused "kept or used, or managed as a gambling or betting house, or acted in the conduct of betting therein."

The agent for the accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint. The Judge (Sheriff-substitute Orphoot) repelled the objection. The accused then pleaded not guilty, and evidence was led.

On 15th July 1903 the Judge found that the accused "between the dates, and in the passage libelled, acted in the conduct of betting, and to this extent" found "the accused guilty accordingly," and therefore fined him £5, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment. The fine was paid.

On 29th September 1904 Kelly presented a bill of suspension.

Argued for the complainer;—A passage was not a "house, building, room, or place" within the meaning of section 284 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879,[1] and the conviction was therefore bad, and ought to be suspended.[2]

(2) There had been no undue delay in presenting the suspension. It was always a question of circumstances and discretion whether a suspension should be refused upon that ground.[3] The circumstances here were sufficient to justify the delay. The complainer certainly never acquiesced in the conviction. Two betting cases having been decided about the same time, viz., this case and Wright's[2] case, it was not thought necessary to appeal in more than one of them, the question being the same in both. The accused in both cases had the same legal advisers. The first six months' delay was thus explained by the complainer having waited until the decision of the High Court had been given in the case of Wright.[2] It was quite proper for the complainer to await the result of that appeal. After the decision in Wright[2] the complainer on 21st December 1903 applied to the Clerk and the Prosecutor of the Police Court to strike out the conviction, and to repay the fine, but this they refused to do, and said that the conviction could only be cleared away by bringing a suspension. In January 1904 the complainer's agent wrote for a copy of the proceedings in Wright,[2] but he did not get it till July. The delay after the decision in Wright[2] was therefore due to the fault of the Police Court officials.

Dec. 16, 1904. Kelly v. Smith.

Argued for the respondent;—This suspension was barred by mora. Mora and acquiescence were enough to bar a suspension of an implemented sentence. Strictly and logically after a sentence had been implemented suspension was incompetent, but, reduction being incompetent in the Court of Justiciary, a relaxation of the strict rule had been introduced, and suspension of an implemented sentence was allowed if the suspension was brought timeously. If, however, there was any lengthened delay in seeking redress the Court would refuse to sustain the suspension.[1] The case of Watson v. Scott[2] was directly in point, as the suspension was brought there, as here, in consequence of a supervening decision of the High Court.[3] In the cases cited[1] the periods of delay were respectively eleven months, five months, and six months, whereas here the period was fourteen months, and even after the decision in Wright[4] nine months had elapsed before the suspension was presented. In no case had a suspension been sustained where there was delay unless the delay was adequately explained. Here there was no adequate explanation.

Lord Adam.—The complaint in this case was brought against a man Kelly for a contravention of section 284 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, by acting as the keeper, or as a person having the care or management, of premises at 15 St Mary Street, Edinburgh, which premises or a passage or place there he kept or used or managed as a gambling or betting house, or acted in the conduct of gambling or betting therein.

On that complaint he was tried, with the result that he was convicted of having contravened the said section of the Act, by having acted in the passage libelled in the conduct of betting, and sentenced to pay a fine of £5, or in default of payment to suffer thirty days' imprisonment.

He paid the fine and so implemented the conviction, and he now brings this suspension to have the conviction set aside. The prosecutor says that whether the conviction was right on the merits or not, this suspension is brought too late.

The ground on which this conviction is said to be bad is this—that it is not sufficient to charge a person with acting in the conduct of betting in a passage, and that in the previous case of Wright v. Smith,[4] it was decided that acting in the conduct of gambling in a passage did not fall within the terms of section 284 of the Act if the passage in question was a common passage.

That case was decided on 19th December 1903, and it then seems to have occurred to the present suspender that that case ruled this one, and the question now before us is—Is the complainer barred by lapse of time from bringing this suspension? We were referred to the cases of Skinner v. Adamson[1] and Russel v. Sprot,[1] which appear to be the leading cases on the point, and they seem to shew that where a conviction has been implemented there must be reasonable grounds for excluding the idea of acquiescence in the conviction, in order to make suspension a competent remedy.

The Court, however, has introduced relaxations of the rule where the circumstances warrant such a course being followed, and the question accordingly is whether this is a case for the exercise of that relaxation. The conviction in this case was pronounced on 15th July 1903, and the fine was paid shortly thereafter. The decision in the case of Wright v. Smith[1] was given on 19th December 1903—i.e., six months after the conviction in the present case. What is the cause of the delay? It is not said that it was owing to want of money. The reason apparently is that the complainer in this case only thought of suspending after the decision in Wright v. Smith[1] had been pronounced; otherwise why did he not bring his suspension in July?

Moreover, the case of Wright[1] was decided in December 1903, and we are now in December 1904. Is there any good reason for this further delay?

No doubt at first there was some reason for the delay, for the complainer's agents had applied to the Prosecutor and the Clerk of Court after the case of Wright[1] had been decided to have the conviction in this case deleted from the record. The answer they got was that that could not be done, and that the proper remedy was to bring a suspension in the ordinary way.

Why did he not do so? Why did he not bring it until a period of eight months had elapsed?

I am disposed to think that in the circumstances of the present case this suspension comes too late. This conviction was implemented eighteen months ago, and I do not think any good reason has been shewn for interfering with it now.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, and for the reasons which Lord Adam has given. I think this suspension is too late. We are asked in December 1904 to suspend a conviction pronounced on 15th July 1903, and followed by payment of the fine imposed. No satisfactory reason has been given for the delay. Even if the first delay of six months is sufficiently explained by the suspender having waited for the decision in the case of Wright,[1] Dec. 19, 1903, which I think it is not, the second delay between December 1903 and September 1904 is not explained at all. The suspender now says that the conviction is liable to a fatal objection, and I assume that this is so, although I do not give any opinion on the subject. If so, he was bound to present his suspension at once, or at least immediately after the decision in the case of Wright[1] in December 1903. The course which the suspender pursued after that date is not favourable. He asked the Prosecutor and the Clerk in the Police Court to strike out the conviction against him and to repay the fine. The answer they gave was the perfectly proper one, that they could do nothing of the kind, and that if he wanted to clear away the conviction he must bring a suspension. But he did not do so for eight months. The six months which he had delayed before December 1903 and the eight months after that make fourteen months' delay in all, and I think that brings this case within the authorities cited.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-General.
Lord Adam.
Lord Kinnear.

ON a summary complaint brought in the Police Court at Alloa, under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, at the instance of Charles Thomson, solicitor, Alloa, burgh prosecutor, James Wright, hairdresser, Alloa, was convicted of a contravention of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), section 407, by using his shop as a gaming or betting house, and was fined £5, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment.

He brought a suspension.

The complainer averred;—(Stat. 2) "The complainer . . . appeared . . . to answer to said complaint." (Stat. 3) "The Court commenced at eleven o'clock, and there were then on the bench Bailies Calder, Duff, and Crawford, all magistrates of the burgh of Alloa. The said complaint was called in Court before said three magistrates. The complainer pleaded not guilty to the charge against him, and after evidence had been led the respondent and the agent for the complainer addressed the said three magistrates. After hearing the respondent and the said agent, the three magistrates retired with the Clerk of Court to consider their judgment. After being absent from Court for some time Bailie Calder announced that the charge against Wright had been found proved." (Stat. 4) "The said three magistrates thereupon heard the complainer's agent, who asked that the penalty should be modified. After hearing the respondent in reply, the said three magistrates consulted together and Bailie Calder intimated that the complainer was fined £5 with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment." (Stat. 5) "There are herewith produced copies of the Alloa newspapers containing reports of the trial. These reports all bear out the truth of the foregoing averments by the complainer." (Stat. 6) "Though the said three magistrates were present at the hearing of the complaint last mentioned, and took part in the deliberations thereon, the said conviction is signed by only one of said magistrates, viz., Bailie Calder. The said Bailie Calder signs said conviction in his individual capacity, and not as preses of the Court." *

The complainer pleaded;—The said conviction ought to be suspended, in respect that it is signed by only one magistrate out of three who were on the bench during the hearing of the complaint on which said conviction followed, and who tried said case.

Argued for the complainer in the suspension;—If a case was tried before more than one magistrate then either all must sign the conviction or one must sign as preses, and a conviction in such circumstances signed by one magistrate not signing as preses was bad, and should be suspended.[1] This was a matter not of form but of substance.[1] Here it was relevantly averred, and at least prima facie proved by the newspaper reports produced, that there were in fact three magistrates who sat in this trial, and the sentence was signed only by one, who did not sign as preses. If the facts were as averred by the complainer then the conviction was clearly bad. No doubt there was this difference between the present case and the cases of Williamson[1] and Simpson,[1] that there the record bore that more than one magistrate had sat in the trial, whereas here the record bore that there was only one magistrate sitting. But it was specifically averred, and prima facie proved, that the record was not in accordance with the facts, and if this averment was denied by the respondent inquiry should be allowed as to what was the truth of the matter.[2] In the case of Nardini v. Walker[3] a remit was refused only because the complainer's averments were improbable, and the respondent's version of the facts the more credible. That was not so here.

Argued for the respondent;—The proper evidence as to who were present as judges at the trial was the record kept by the Clerk. In Williamson v. Thomson[1] and Simpson v. Reid[1] the record bore that more than one magistrate was sitting in judgment, while only one signed. Here the record was ex facie quite regular. It was moreover true in fact. One magistrate only tried the case. Two others were present, one in waiting, and one as a spectator. Even if the sitting magistrate had consulted his brethren in the course of the trial that would not have made them judges sitting in the cause. There was no case for inquiry here. Such inquiry would only be allowed in a suspension if the matters complained of really amounted to oppression or to a miscarriage or denial of justice.[1] No such case was averred here.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I cannot say I have any doubt as to the manner in which this case is to be disposed of. It was a proceeding in the Police Court of Alloa, and as the case comes before us on the record there was undoubtedly one magistrate who sat, and the question comes to be if there is ground for allowing inquiry as to the allegation that there were also two other magistrates who sat judicially, and of whose views we have no record. Now, I think we should always be disposed when we find the proceedings ex facie regular to presume they correctly state what happened, and are therefore to make faith in judgment unless there are distinct averments that the record is false or important matter has been omitted. Here it is averred that whereas the sederunt is made to consist of one magistrate it really consisted of three. This is a matter which must have been in the knowledge of the magistrates and the Clerk; they could have no doubt who was trying the case. Other magistrates may have been present. It is a common practice for a number of magistrates to attend and arrange that one of their number should try the case. The others may stand about or go away. In this case the allegation amounts to no more than this, that three magistrates were present, of whom one was undoubtedly acting officially, and nothing is said to make it clear that the other two were seised of their office so as to make it a sine qua non that they should appear in the sederunt. The Clerk would make it his business to ascertain whether they were acting officially or not. I see no ground for setting aside the proceedings on such allegations as we have.

LORD ADAM.—The charge in this case was that the accused did contravene the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, particularly sec. 407 thereof, by using the shop kept by and occupied by him in Coalgate Street, Alloa, as a gaming or betting house. Upon this charge he was tried, with the result that he was convicted and fined £5, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment. That conviction is signed "John J. Calder, Magistrate." It is now sought to set it aside on the ground that John J. Calder was not the sole magistrate who tried the case, but that in fact there were three magistrates, and that the case having been tried by three magistrates the conviction required to be signed by all the three or by one of them as preses, and that this conviction was not so signed. The question therefore is whether it was not the fact that John J. Calder was the sole magistrate who tried the suspender. If it was the fact, then there is no ground of objection to the conviction. It is not said that the suspender suffered any injustice or oppression. It is said that this matter of the signing of the conviction is one of substance and not of form, but I do not see how it could involve any practical injustice to the suspender here.

Wright v. Thomson.

To see who it was that tried the case we must go to the minutes of procedure. They bear that the suspender was tried "in presence of John Joseph Calder, Esq., one of the magistrates of the burgh of Alloa." Therefore, as far as the minutes shew, Mr Calder was the magistrate, and the only magistrate, who tried the case. That is in conformity with the usual practice in the Police Court. One bailie is appointed to sit in the Court for a certain period. I have no doubt that in this case Bailie Calder sat alone and tried the case by himself.

It is said that there were other bailies on the bench. Suppose there were, that does not make them magistrates who tried this case, and even if, happening to be present, they were consulted by the magistrate who was trying the case, that would not make any difference. The presence of other magistrates on the bench does not come to much.

But then it is said that all the three magistrates and the clerk retired together after the case had been heard. Suppose they did, and suppose the Judge who was trying the case did consult the other magistrates who happened to be present, I do not think that supports the suspender's contention. Then the suspender goes on to say that they came back, and Bailie Calder announced the conviction and the sentence. There is nothing in this to shew that Mr Calder was not the sole magistrate who tried the case. It is not said that the other magistrates interfered in any way with the conduct of the trial. All that is said is that they "were present at the hearing" and "took part in the deliberations thereon." There is nothing here to justify inquiry or the disturbing of this conviction and sentence.

This case is quite different from the case of Williamson,[1] where the record bore that the case was tried by more than one magistrate and the conviction was only signed by one of them, whereas here the record bears that the case was tried by one magistrate only.

I see no ground for interfering with the conviction.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree, for the reasons stated by your Lordships, and I should only add that the judgment proposed seems to me to be entirely consistent with the previous cases of Williamson v. Thomson[1] and Simpson v. Reid,[2] and at the same time it is not inconsistent with the opinions of the Judges who dissented in these cases. In the case of Williamson v. Thomson[1] the record bore that the trial took place in the presence of two magistrates, while the conviction bore to have been pronounced only by one. There was nothing to shew whether the other magistrate had concurred in the sentence pronounced. In Simpson v. Reid[2] the record was exactly in the same terms. It bore that the accused appeared in the presence of James Scott and David Patrick Donald, magistrates of the burgh of Johnstone, whereas the conviction was signed by one only of these magistrates. In that case there was a difference of opinion. Lord Kyllachy, who was one of the majority, held that the Court must proceed on the record, and could not go behind it to inquire as to whether the magistrate who did not sign the conviction was on the bench merely as a spectator. In the present case we must take the record as it stands. The objection is purely technical, and I see no reason in the cases cited for disturbing the conviction.

It is also provided that "in the case of a certificate regarding . . . butter . . . the analyst shall specially report whether any change had taken place in the constitution of the article that would interfere with the analysis."

In a suspension of a conviction under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, sec. 6, for selling butter containing 92 per cent of foreign ingredients, held (1) that it was not a valid objection to the analyst's certificate appended to the complaint that the space for the weight of the sample was left blank without any statement that the article could not be conveniently weighed; but (2) that the certificate was invalid in respect that the analyst did not report whether any change had taken place in the constitution of the article, the direction in the schedule so to report being imperative in the case of butter, and that, the article having been sent for analysis as butter, the failure to comply with the direction was not excused by the article having proved on analysis to be margarine; and bill of suspension sustained and conviction quashed.

HIGH COURT. Lord Adam. Lord M'Laren. Lord Kinnear.

IN the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright, on a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, at the instance of George Wintrup, sanitary inspector of the county and of the burgh of Kirkcudbright, and officer charged with the execution of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899, John Hunter, grocer, High Street, Kirkcudbright, was charged, time and place libelled, with having sold to the complainer to his prejudice one-half pound of salt butter which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, in respect that it contained 92 per cent of foreign ingredients, namely, foreign fat, contrary to the provisions of sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, as amended by sec. 2 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879.

The certificate of the analyst, under the Food and Drugs Acts, which was appended to the complaint, was as follows:—

"I, the undersigned, public analyst for the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and burghs of Kirkcudbright, Dalbeattie, Castle-Douglas, Gatehouse, and New Galloway, do hereby certify that I received, on the 6th day of August 1904, from Mr George Wintrup, inspector, a sample of butter, marked No. 247, for analysis (which then weighed ), and have analysed the same, and declare the result of my analysis to be as follows:—

"I am of opinion that the said sample contained the percentages of foreign ingredients as under:—

"At least 92 per cent of the fat present is foreign fat.

"This is a sample of margarine.

"As witness my hand at Dumfries, this 19th day of August 1904.

"JAMES DAVIDSON."*

The accused, inter alia, stated the following objections:—

"To certificate produced.

"To the certificate of the analyst being received in evidence in respect—

"(1) That butter being an article that can be conveniently weighed, and the certificate being blank on this point, the certificate is not in conformity with the Act and schedule.

"(2) It being enacted that in a certificate regarding butter the analyst shall specially report whether any change had taken place in the constitution of the article that would interfere with the analysis, and this not being complied with, the certificate is not in conformity with the Act.

"(3) That the certificate, while bearing that the sample was received on 6th August 1904, bears to be granted on 19th August 1904, and during this period of thirteen days the butter was liable to decomposition."

The Sheriff-substitute (Napier) repelled these objections.

The accused pleaded not guilty.

Evidence was led, and the Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the evidence adduced, convicted Hunter of the contravention charged, and fined him £3 with the alternative of twenty days' imprisonment.

No. 6.

Dec. 17, 1904. Hunter v. Wintrup.

Hunter brought a suspension.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—The said pretended sentence or judgment ought to be suspended in respect— . . . (2) The pretended analyst's certificate is inept and invalid, and not conform to the statute libelled.

The complainer also objected to the conviction and sentence upon other grounds which the Court did not find it necessary to consider.

The complainer in the suspension maintained the objections to the validity of the certificate stated by him in the Sheriff Court, and contended that in view of the importance of the certificate in prosecutions of this kind, the conviction must be quashed where, as here, the certificate was not valid and was not strictly in accordance with the directions in the statute. He cited the Act and cases undernoted.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) It must be assumed that the analyst found it inconvenient to weigh the sample. The statute[2] did not lay on the analyst the duty of giving a reason for not giving the weight. He was entitled to leave the weight blank and say nothing about it. He was the sole judge as to whether the sample could be conveniently weighed or not. (2) The article here was not butter, but margarine. The provisions of Note 4 to the schedule did not apply to margarine, and where the article, as here, was margarine, the analyst was not bound to report whether any change had taken place.

LORD ADAM.—This is a suspension of a conviction proceeding on a complaint under the Food and Drugs Acts. The charge was that the accused did sell to the complainer to his prejudice one-half pound of salt butter which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, in respect that it contained ninety-two per cent of foreign ingredients. There was appended to the complaint, and made part of it, the certificate of the public analyst who had analysed the article of food referred to in the complaint. The accused appeared to answer to the complaint, and stated an objection to the relevancy, which was repelled. The trial went on, evidence was led, and the accused was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of £3, or to imprisonment for twenty days.

Now, four objections are stated to this conviction. Two of them turn on the form of the analyst's certificate, the third is on a point of procedure, and the fourth relates to the form of the sentence.

The first objection to the form of the certificate by the public analyst is, that whereas the form of a certificate given in the schedule to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63) requires the sample to be weighed, or a statement to be made that it could not conveniently be weighed, this certificate did not state why the sample was not weighed. I think there is no substance in this objection. In the form of certificate after the words "which then weighed" there is a blank, and the note to the form is this, "when the article cannot conveniently be weighed, this passage may be erased or the blank may be left unfilled." It is left in the discretion of the analyst. Here he left the blank unfilled. I think he filled up this part of the certificate in the form required by the Act.

The next objection is a more serious one. The note to the schedule form requires that "in the case of a certificate regarding milk, butter, or any article liable to decomposition, the analyst shall specially report whether any change had taken place in the constitution of the article that would interfere with the analysis." The article sent to the analyst in this case was butter. That being so, the note to the schedule form left the analyst no option whether he should or should not report whether any change had taken place in the article. It required him to report on that point. But he does not do so. The space for this report is left blank. It is said that the analyst received the sample on 6th August and did not analyse it until 19th August. Even if it were necessary to shew that the sample might have deteriorated, I think the suspender has done so, but it is not necessary. The note to the form is imperative, and says that the analyst shall report whether any change had taken place. This is not a case where, as in Hudson,[1] there was a doubt whether the article in question would change. The direction in the case of butter is imperative. This certificate contains no report of the nature required by the note to the schedule. I agree in what was said in the English cases as to the importance of the analyst's certificate. It is the foundation of the whole case for the prosecutor. Section 21 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), says that it is to be sufficient evidence of itself of the facts stated in it, and it is of the last importance that all the directions of the statute with regard to it should be strictly complied with. That being so, it appears to me that this objection to the conviction is well founded. It is said that the article here was not butter but margarine. I think there is nothing in that. What was sent to the analyst was sent as butter. He analysed it as butter. He was bound to report upon it as required in the case of butter. I do not know whether in fact it would deteriorate or not. It is immaterial. I think this objection is good. If so, it is not necessary to consider the other objections.

LORD M'LAREN.—The first objection to the proceedings is founded on the direction in the schedule appended to the 1875 Act (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63) as to the weighing of the sample sent for analysis. The direction is that the analyst shall certify that he received on from a sample of for analysis (which then weighed ), and it is provided in a footnote that "when the article cannot be conveniently weighed this passage may be erased or the blank left unfilled."

I assume, in accordance with elementary principles, that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the analyst must be held to have complied with the statutory direction and to have applied his mind to the question whether the article could be conveniently weighed or not. All proof on this point would appear to be superfluous, because I assume that he has done his duty, and the only question is whether he ought to have made a special report.

We have sometimes had occasion to criticise public officials who have

[1] 19 T. L. R. 369, 67 J. P. Rep. 186.

No. 6.
Dec. 17, 1904.
Hunter v. Wintrup.

tried to improve on a statute, but in this case the analyst has complied literally with the statutory directions and has left the form blank as to the matter of weight. This objection therefore entirely fails.

The second objection is more serious. It relates to the failure of the analyst to comply with the direction in the footnote appended to the schedule as to a certificate regarding "milk, butter, or any article liable to decomposition." This direction is imperative as distinguished from the direction contained in the previous footnote, which gives the analyst a discretionary power as to entering the weight. In the case of "milk, butter, or any article liable to decomposition," the analyst is required to make a special report as to whether any change has taken place in the constitution of the article that would interfere with the analysis. Here he has not done so.

Now, we are not without guidance in this matter, for this question was very carefully considered in the case of Hudson v. Bridge.[1] I refer particularly to the opinions expressed by Lord Alverstone and Mr Justice Channell. I entirely concur in the reasoning of these learned Judges, and I think the direction in the schedule refers to the article in question, which purported to be butter sent for analysis. The analyst must keep in view the provisions as to a certificate relating to butter when the substance sent him for analysis is sent to him as butter. He cannot know what the article is until he has analysed it, but he is required to deal with it from the beginning as if it were butter, which is an article liable to decomposition.

The objection taken is no doubt a strict one, but, in my opinion, it must be sustained. There ought to have been a special report as to whether any change had taken place in the constitution of the article that would interfere with the analysis. In the ordinary case the examination of the analyst as a witness is dispensed with, and it is necessary, in order that advantage may be taken of this economical provision, that the report should be strictly in terms of the statute.

In the circumstances it is unnecessary to consider the other objections.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordships on both the points decided. I give no opinion on the other points. They are not necessary for our judgment, and therefore I agree with your Lordship in the chair in expressing no opinion upon them one way or the other.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Pass the bill: Suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern."

HIGH COURT.
Lord Adam.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kinnear.

ANDREW FLANNAGAN, bookmaker, residing at Morton House, Morton Place, Kilmarnock, was charged in the Police Court, Kilmarnock, at the instance of George Hill, burgh prosecutor for the public interest, upon a summary complaint, which set forth that on 16th, 17th, 21st, and 22d June 1904, "within the enclosed piece of ground or place situated in Woodstock Place, at the junction of Woodstock Place and Morton Place, in the burgh of Kilmarnock, which piece of ground or place is enclosed by stone and brick walls and door under lock and key," the accused did "use said enclosed piece of ground or place as a betting-house for conducting betting, all contrary to section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,* whereby" the accused "is liable in a penalty not exceeding £50, and in default of immediate payment to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months."

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint upon various grounds, and, inter alia, upon the grounds (a) that the accused was not alleged to be the owner or keeper or caretaker of or manager or otherwise connected with the enclosure; (c) that said enclosure was not a house, room, or place within the meaning of the section libelled; and (e) that the penalty was incorrectly stated. These objections were repelled by the Magistrate.

At an adjourned diet the accused pleaded not guilty. Evidence was led, and the Magistrate, "in respect of the evidence adduced," found "the accused guilty of the offence charged," and fined him £25, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment. The sentence did not contain any forfeiture of the money found in the place alleged to be used as a betting-house.

Flannagan appealed upon a stated case.

The case stated that the Magistrate held, inter alia, the following facts proved:—(1) That the appellant was a bookmaker. (2) That the ground in question was a place in the burgh of Kilmarnock. That it was of a triangular shape and its area was 138 square yards. That it was enclosed by walls 6 feet in height, and was vacant of buildings. That the doors were kept locked when the ground was not open to the public. (3) That the ground in question was let to George Wylie for three years from Whitsunday 1904, at a rent of £5 per annum. That the lease was assigned by George Wylie to Alexander Biggar. (5) That while the ground in question might serve for practising quoiting, it is quite unsuitable for quoiting matches on account of its dimensions. (6) That the ground was advertised as the Central Quoiting Ground, and opened on 11th June 1904 to the public, the charge for admission being advertised as 1d. (7) That Alexander Biggar was in charge of the entrance door on the four dates specified in the complaint. (9) That the appellant was present on the ground on each of the 16th, 17th, and 21st June from a few minutes before 12 o'clock noon until the closing of the ground in the afternoon, and left on each day in company with the said Alexander Biggar. That the appellant was present also on the ground from 11.50 A.M. on 22d June until his arrest at 1.50 P.M. on that day. That he was also present on the ground on the evening of 17th June from 7 till 9.15, and on the evening of the 18th from 6.45 till 9.25, leaving on each occasion in company with the said Alexander Biggar. (10) That the appellant sometimes moved about the ground, occasionally quoited, and occasionally marked for others who were quoiting, but generally took up a position near the wall along Woodstock Place, with his back towards that wall. (11) That on 16th June fifteen men entered the ground in question, of whom nine gave money and slips of paper to the appellant, who wrote something in a note-book. That some of these persons subsequently received money from the appellant. Similar findings were made as to 17th, 21st, and 22d June. (12) That no match at quoits took place on the ground in question on any of the dates mentioned in the complaint, but a little quoiting took place on each of these dates. That some of the men who entered the ground quoited for a considerable time, that others only threw a few quoits, but the majority did not quoit at all. That a good many of them on entering the ground went direct to the appellant, handed him money and slips of paper, and left the ground immediately. (13) That there was found upon the person of the appellant when he was apprehended, inter alia, sixteen slips of paper with the names of horses running in races on 21st and 22d June and sums of money written thereon, such as are used for betting purposes; a note-book having the names of horses and sums of money written thereon; and £15, 15s. 10½d. in money.

The presiding Magistrate held it proved that the ground in question was not used in good faith as a quoiting ground, but that it was primarily used as a betting-house by the appellant, that the appellant acted in conducting betting upon the enclosed ground in question, and that such enclosed ground was a place within the meaning of section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.

No. 7.

Dec. 20, 1904.
Flannagan v. Hill.

The questions of law were, inter alia:—"(4) Is the ground in question a place within the meaning of section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892? (5) Was the Magistrate right in holding that on the facts held proved there was a contravention of section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and convicting the appellant of the offence charged? (6) Was the Magistrate entitled to convict the accused without forfeiting the money and other productions taken from him within the enclosure in question at the time of his apprehension?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) Assuming for the purposes of this appeal that this enclosure was used for betting, this was not a "place" within the meaning of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,[1] sec. 407. A "place" in the sense of that section must be a place which could be held to be a "betting-house," and it must be a place ejusdem generis with a house or room. It must be a roofed building. It was also essential that the betting should be carried on by or under the owner or the occupier.[2] Even if this was a "place" within the meaning of the section the appellant was not the occupier or keeper of the premises, nor was he a person "conducting such gaming or betting" in the sense of the section. Conducting meant conducting as the person having control over the place as occupier, and occupying and using it as a betting establishment.[3] (2) The penalty (a) was not correctly stated in the complaint, and (b) was not imposed as directed by the statute. Section 407 directed that all implements of gaming and all money found in the betting-house should be forfeited. £15 was found on the accused. There was nothing about forfeiture in the complaint. This was contrary to the direction in the Schedule form of complaint,[4] which required that the forfeiture should be stated. It might be enough if the prosecutor simply referred to the section libelled for the penalties and forfeitures incurred without setting them forth. But if he set them forth he must set them forth correctly.[5] If a person accused was liable to a forfeiture the magistrate should be informed of it, because it might affect the amount of penalty or imprisonment which he would think it right to award. The conviction and sentence simply echoed the complaint. There was nothing about forfeiture of the money found on the accused. A statutory penalty or forfeiture could not be dispensed with altogether. If the sentence was not in accordance with the statute it was no answer to say that the sentence imposed was more lenient than the sentence which might have been imposed.[6]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) Section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,[1] dealt with private places used for betting. Cases relating to public places used for that purpose were not in point. Betting in public places was dealt with in section 393 of the Act.[1] The case of Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Company[2] was to be distinguished. The "place" there was an enclosure adjoining a racecourse, and belonged to a racecourse company. It was held in proceedings against the company that the company were not guilty of using the place for betting or of conducting betting because bookmakers were permitted by them to resort to the place for betting purposes, just as any other member of the public might. In that case it was said that any place which was sufficiently definite, and in which a betting establishment might be conducted, would be a "place" within the meaning of the Act there construed,[3] and this implied that the place did not necessarily require to be covered by a roof.[4] The case of Henretty v. Hart,[5] which was a prosecution directed against the occupier of a racecourse, had no application here either. Under the Betting Act, 1853,[3] proceedings on account of using "places" on racecourses for betting had been held good when directed against the bookmakers themselves.[6] Sec. 407 was to be read as striking not only at the owner or keeper of premises used for betting and persons acting under him, but also at the persons in fact conducting the betting in the premises so used, although not the owners, occupiers, or keepers.[7] It was not necessary to prove that the accused was the owner, keeper, or occupier of the premises, if (a) they were used as a betting establishment, and (b) the accused was the person who in fact conducted the betting there carried on. These two facts were established here. (2) It was not necessary to set forth the forfeiture incurred in the complaint or in the sentence. The forfeiture was automatic, and operated without any authority being required. It was not part of the sentence at all.[8] In no previous case under any of the statutory enactments against betting was the forfeiture prayed for in the complaint.

Lord Adam.—The appellant in this case was charged with a complaint setting forth that he did, on the dates therein specified, within an enclosed piece of ground in the burgh of Kilmarnock, "use the said enclosed piece of ground or place as a betting-house for conducting betting," contrary to section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, whereby he became liable to a penalty not exceeding £50, and in default of payment to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months.

The case sets forth the procedure which took place in the Police Court, viz., that certain preliminary objections were stated to the relevancy of the complaint and repelled—and then follows a statement of the facts which the presiding Magistrate held to be proved, and which includes an elaborate description of the piece of ground in question.

No. 7.

Dec. 20, 1904.
Flannagan v. Hill.

Then we have a statement as to how this piece of ground was used, and also as to what took place there on the occasions in June when the appellant visited the ground.

We are also told that when the appellant was arrested he was searched, and sixteen slips of paper with the names of horses and sums of money written thereon, a notebook also containing the names of horses and sums of money, a parcel of tickets, and £15, 15s. 10½d. in money were found on his person and taken from him before he left the ground to go to the Police Office.

On these facts the Magistrate held it proved that the ground in question was not used in good faith as a quoiting ground, but that it was primarily used as a betting-house by the appellant, that the appellant acted in conducting betting upon the enclosed ground in question, and that such enclosed ground was a place within the meaning of section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1872, and he accordingly convicted the appellant and fined him £25.

The question of law specially put to us was the 4th,—"Is the ground in question a place within the meaning of section 407 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892?"

Now, that section sets forth—(His Lordship read the section).

It is said by the appellant that this piece of ground is not a "house," or "room," or "place" in the sense of the Act, and that it is not a "place," because "place" must mean something ejusdem generis with a "house" or "room."

Now, it is to be observed in the first instance that what seems to be contemplated by this section of the statute is an enclosed place, and of that there cannot be much doubt, for the section gives the police power to force an entrance if necessary, and to arrest any persons found therein.

Further, the "place" must have limits, and I should think also that to be of the same nature as "house" or "room" it must be the private property of the owner.

Now, what we have here is an enclosure. The gate leading into the ground was always kept locked except when the appellant made his appearance, when it was opened, and it was again shut and locked when he went away. It seems beyond all doubt to have been mainly used for the purpose of betting, and the question is whether such a piece of ground as this falls within the description of a "house, room, or place used as a betting-house," i.e., a place used for the purpose of betting.

There can be no doubt that this piece of ground was used as a betting-house—for the question after all is, how was this piece of ground kept or used? i.e., for what purpose was it kept or used? Was it or was it not used for the purposes for which a betting-house is kept or used? That seems to me to be the proper way in which to construe the words of the section before us, and I have no doubt that upon the facts stated here it was so used. Therefore it humbly appears to me that this enclosure was kept and used as a betting-house.

If that be so, the next question is, was the appellant in the circumstances a person against whom this complaint could be brought? That again depends on the latter part of section 407, which provides as follows—(His Lordship read the part of the section in point).

No. 7.

Dec. 20, 1904.
Flannagan v. Hill.

It is said, however, that the appellant is not the owner or keeper of the place, but the facts shew that he was not there as a stranger or visitor, but that he was present as the person conducting the betting. That being so, and as the place wherein he was conducting it falls within the meaning of a "place" in the sense of the Act, I think that he comes within the category of a person acting in conducting a betting-house, and that he is liable to a penalty.

I think therefore that the offence here falls within the section, and that the appellant was rightly convicted.

The other objections stated to us were not objections on the merits, but were purely technical. I do not think there was anything in these objections which would justify us in interfering with the result at which the Magistrate has arrived.

LORD M'LAREN.—The most important question in the case is whether this enclosed ground is subject to be treated as a betting-house under section 407 of the Burgh Police Act. If the provisions of the Act had been directed against the keeping of a betting-house, or if the words had amounted only to the prohibition of betting in any house, room, or place, I should have been disposed to think that it would be too extended a construction of the Act, and not within its fair meaning, to apply it to an enclosed open-air place like a yard or garden not fitted for habitation. But the words of the section are not nearly so restricted as that, because the section is directed against the keeping of any house or place which is kept or used "as a betting-house." Accordingly, the question is not what is the character or description of the place in which the offence is committed, but, whatever be its description, was it kept or used for the purposes for which a betting-house is usually kept—in other words, for the purpose of carrying on the practice of betting as a trade. On the facts found, it appears to me to be clear that in this enclosure betting was regularly and extensively carried on by the appellant as his trade. The people who went there for the most part went to make bets. The ostensible use of the enclosure was quoiting, but that was not what it was really used for. The ground was not suitable, and it was little used for that purpose. So much for the use which is made of this enclosure, and we have to consider whether this amounts to the use of the enclosure "as a betting-house." Now, the syllable "house" when united to another word may have a wider meaning than when it stands alone. A place for giving stage representations in the open air might not unreasonably fall within regulations as to "play-houses." On the other hand a coach-house or a boat-house seems to imply a roofed building, the object being protection. The thing intended to be prohibited by the statute was the carrying on of the business of betting in private premises, and I think we are not giving the section too wide a meaning if we hold that a place which is enclosed and kept under a lock and key, although it is without a roof, and which is regularly used for the purpose of betting, may be a "place" which is kept and used as a betting-house.

There are other objections to the conviction. The most important of these arises on the same section of the statute. It is, whether it is necessary that money found on the establishment should be forfeited as part of the sentence. As I read the clause it is not put upon the magistrate who hears the case to forfeit anything. What he has to do is to convict and impose a suitable penalty. Then the section provides that "upon conviction of any such offender . . . all the moneys and securities for money, which shall have been seized as aforesaid, shall be paid over to the collector of police." If here any money was lawfully seized (within the scope of this enactment) it was not part of the magistrate's duty to forfeit the money, and indeed he had no power to do so. If there is no conviction the money is to be paid to the owner. If there is a conviction then the money found is to be paid over to the collector of police. It appears to me that this provision was designed to leave open the claims of persons who might say they had nothing to do with the betting, and that the money was theirs. It would be rather unfair if sums of money, it may be of considerable amount, were liable to be forfeited by the sentence of a police magistrate, possibly upon imperfect evidence, or in the absence of the owner of the money. I am therefore of opinion that the conviction is not open to objection on the ground that the money seized ought to have been forfeited. It is not at all clear to my mind that the money to be impounded includes money which may be found on the person of the accused. Primarily what is meant is money found upon a gaming table, or in the repositories of the keeper of the house. It was certainly not intended that persons who are merely found in the betting-house, and who are not proved to have assisted the keeper of the house in his trade, should be searched, still less that money found on their persons should be forfeited as a consequence of the conviction of the keeper of the betting-house.

No. 7.

Flannagan v. Hill.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the 4th, 5th, and 6th questions in the case in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

Justice of Peace—Jurisdiction—Jurisdiction in Police Burgh—Licensing Offences—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25), sec. 91.—Held that the Justices of the Peace of a county have concurrent jurisdiction along with the Magistrates of a police burgh situated within the county to try offences under the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, where such offences are committed within burgh by persons residing therein.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Adam.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Kinnear.

JOHN SIMPSON, licensed grocer, residing at Simpson's Square, Buckhaven, was charged in the Justice of Peace Court of Fifeshire, at the instance of John Kerr Tasker, Procurator-fiscal of Court, upon a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, which set forth that the accused, "on Sunday, 6th November 1904, within the dwelling-house at Simpson's Square, Buckhaven, aforesaid, Wemyss parish, Fifeshire, occupied by him, did traffic in exciseable liquors without a certificate to him in that behalf granted, according to the provisions of the Act first after mentioned, by selling a pint bottle of whisky to" a person named and designed, "contrary to the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 65."

On 25th November 1904 the accused appeared to answer to the complaint in the Justice of the Peace Court at Kirkcaldy in presence of two of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Fife. He took objection to the jurisdiction of the Court in respect that the alleged offence was stated to have been committed within Buckhaven, which was within the police burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven, which had a separate licensing authority, and by a person residing therein, and was therefore, by section 91 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, excluded from the jurisdiction of the Justices of the Peace for the county.*

The Justices sustained the objection, and dismissed the complaint.

The Procurator-fiscal appealed upon a stated case.

In the case the Justices stated as follows:—"It was admitted at the Bar by the appellant that the locus delicti, being the residence of the respondent, is within the before-mentioned police burgh" (i.e.,

* The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25), enacts:—Sec. 91 (1). "Every person who shall commit any breach of certificate, or who shall in any other manner offend against this Act, shall be prosecuted, and all penalties . . . shall be recovered, unless by this Act otherwise specially directed or authorised, before the Sheriff or any two or more justices of the peace of a county, or any magistrate of a royal, parliamentary, or police burgh having jurisdiction in the county or burgh, as the case may be, in which such offender shall reside or such offence shall have been committed, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal or other prosecutor ordinarily acting in such respective Courts, or in the case of a Justice of the Peace or Burgh Police Court, at the instance of such other party as shall be specially appointed to prosecute such class of offences by the justices of the peace of the county in general quarter sessions assembled, or the town-council of the burgh, as the case may be; . . . and all penalties and expenses of prosecutions and convictions incurred under and imposed by this Act shall, when recovered, if adjudged by any Sheriff, or justice or justices of the peace, or magistrate of any burgh (other than a royal or parliamentary burgh having a separate Licensing Court) be wholly paid into the county fund, and if adjudged by any magistrate of any royal or parliamentary burgh having a separate Licensing Court be wholly paid into the police funds, or where there shall be no police funds, into the corporation funds of the burgh in which such penalties shall be imposed, respectively. (2) Breaches of certificate and other offences in this section referred to may, unless by this Act otherwise specially directed or authorised, be prosecuted and tried as police offences before and by any magistrate or magistrates of any royal, parliamentary, or police burgh officiating in any Court for the trial of police offences under the provisions of any local or general Police Act, in the same way and manner in all respects as may be provided for the trial of police offences by any such local or general Police Act in force in the county, district, or burgh where the offender shall reside, or the offence shall have been committed, and such magistrate or magistrates shall have power to impose the penalties and punishments, and declare the forfeitures, provided in that behalf by this Act. (3) Every offence committed against this Act shall, except where inconsistent with the provisions and conditions of this Act, be tried and determined under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, . . . and it shall be lawful for the Sheriff, justice or justices, magistrate or magistrates, before whom any prosecution is brought, to proceed in absence of the accused. . . ."

Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven), "and that the said burgh has a separate licensing authority, with a prosecutor appointed by the town-council of the said burgh to prosecute in the burgh offences against the said Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, in terms of section 91 of the said Act. It was admitted on behalf of the respondent that the said burgh is within the county of Fife, and that the respondent is a magistrate of the said burgh."

The question of law was,—"Whether the terms of section 91 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, exclude the jurisdiction of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Fife to try in their Court a complaint at the instance of their procurator-fiscal against a person residing in the burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven, accused of a contravention of section 65 of the said Act alleged to have been committed within the said burgh, which is a police burgh within the said county having a separate licensing authority?"

The commission to the Justices of the Peace of the county of Fife was produced. The portions of it founded on in argument are quoted in note infra.*

Argued for the appellant;—The county Justices had jurisdiction in this case. Jurisdiction within police burghs was conferred upon magistrates of police of a police burgh by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,[1] which replaced the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,[2] but the jurisdiction so conferred was concurrent with, not exclusive of, the jurisdiction of the county Justices.[3] The Police Act had a bearing here, because under the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903,[1] section 91, subsection (2), licensing offences were authorised to be tried in the same way as police offences. The county Justices had been held to have concurrent jurisdiction in the county of the city of Edinburgh.[2] The county Justices' commission gave them jurisdiction "as well within liberties as without," and the jurisdiction so given was not confined to their jurisdiction in offences against the peace, but extended to all statutory offences which they were empowered to try anywhere in the county. The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903,[1] section 91, did not purport to take away any jurisdiction previously exercised. Previous to 1903 the county Justices had jurisdiction in police burghs to try licensing offences. For the purposes of the present question there was no difference between section 25 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862,[3] and section 91 of the Act of 1903. Under section 25 of the 1862 Act the county Justices had concurrent jurisdiction in police burghs. That was assumed to be the case in Stirling v. Dickson.[4] But further, the terms of section 91 shewed that concurrent jurisdiction was intended to be exercised by county Justices in police burghs. Under section 25 of the 1862 Act and section 91 of the 1903 Act the position of the county Justices and the Sheriff, and of their respective prosecutors, was the same. If the Sheriff had jurisdiction so had the Justices. Undoubtedly the Sheriff had jurisdiction.[5] It was not competent upon the question stated in this case to decide the question whether the county Justices ever had jurisdiction in licensing offences in police burghs. The question as stated here assumed that the county Justices had jurisdiction prior to the Act of 1903. It was therefore sufficient for the decision of this case that there was nothing in that Act to take away their jurisdiction. Apart from that, however, there could be no doubt that originally the county Justices had jurisdiction in the territory now occupied by police burghs, and there was no statutory provision by which that jurisdiction had been taken away. Therefore it must still remain. Police burghs and royal burghs were not in the same position. Throughout they were treated in the Acts as different.

Argued for the respondent;—The county Justices had no jurisdiction in this case. The terms of the county Justices' commission had no bearing upon the present question. Assuming that, "as well within liberties as without," referred to burghs (which was not admitted), it referred to the original peace jurisdiction only, and not to additional statutory jurisdictions. Neither had the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,[6] any bearing here. There was no doubt that in Police Act offences the Justices had concurrent jurisdiction. The respondent was prepared to concede that for the purposes of this question section 25 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862,[7] was substantially the same as section 91 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903.[8] But it was submitted that the county Justices never had jurisdiction in licensing offences in police burghs. The words "as the case may be" in section 91 pointed to alternative and not to concurrent jurisdiction. They must necessarily refer to jurisdiction, and not to the residence of the accused or the locus delicti. The word "county" in section 91 meant the county outside of royal, parliamentary, and police burghs. The Sheriff, no doubt, had concurrent jurisdiction, but that was because, at common law, and apart from statute, he had jurisdiction to try all offences in the county, unless his jurisdiction was expressly excluded.[1] The position of the Justices was entirely different. The history of the jurisdiction in licensing cases supported the respondent's contention. Licensing offences were created, and jurisdiction was given to try them, by the Act 29 Geo. II. cap. 12, secs. 10 and 14. By section 14 the jurisdiction was conferred upon Justices in the county and Magistrates in royal burghs. By section 32 of 5 Geo. III. cap. 46, penalties were made recoverable before the Sheriff, or the Justices, or the Bailie Court of any royal burgh, "within whose jurisdiction respectively" the offender should reside. This enactment was repeated in section 16 of 44 Geo. III., cap. 55, which in turn was repealed and re-enacted by section 23 of the Home Drummond Act,[2] and was repeated in section 25 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862.[3] Although the word "respectively" was not found in the two last-mentioned statutes, the scheme of all the Acts was trial by Justices in the county outside of royal and, in the last-mentioned Act, also parliamentary burghs, and in the burghs by the magistrates, the Justices not having concurrent jurisdiction in the burghs. Police burghs created after 1862, under the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,[4] were put in this respect in the same position as royal and parliamentary burghs, and the magistrates of all burghs had now jurisdiction in licensing offences within burghs exclusive of the justices. The case of Stirling v. Dickson[5] had no bearing. It merely decided that the Sheriff's Procurator-fiscal had a good title to prosecute.

LORD ADAM.—This is an appeal on a case stated between the Procurator-fiscal of the Justice of the Peace Court of Fifeshire and John Simpson, a licensed grocer, residing and carrying on his business in Buckhaven, under a complaint charging the respondent with a contravention of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, in respect that he sold certain exciseable liquors without the requisite licence in his dwelling-house in Buckhaven.

When the case came before the Justices at their Court in Kirkcaldy objection was taken to their jurisdiction, "in respect that the alleged offence is stated to have been committed within Buckhaven, which is within the police burgh of Buckhaven, Methil, and Innerleven, which has a separate licensing authority, and by a person residing therein, and is therefore by section 91 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, excluded from the jurisdiction of the Justices of the Peace for the county." There is no dispute as to the facts. The complaint libels that John Simpson committed the offence in Buckhaven, and resided there, and Buckhaven is a police burgh having a separate licensing authority. The question of law which the Justices put to us in the case is, whether they were justified in sustaining the respondent's objection, and refusing jurisdiction in the case. The question before us therefore resolves itself into this, whether the Justices of the Peace of the county of Fife have a concurrent jurisdiction within the area of the burgh of Buckhaven with the burgh magistrates to try licensing offences committed within the burgh?

The position of matters is this: This burgh of Buckhaven is not a royal burgh, but it is a police burgh, and it is admitted that until the Police Act of 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101) the Justices of the county were the only magistrates who had summary jurisdiction to try offences of this kind in the area which now forms the burgh. That Police Act for the first time created police burghs with magistrates of their own. The parties to this case are at issue as to whether or not in such police burghs the Justices of the Peace for the county in which they are situated have in fact claimed and exercised a concurrent jurisdiction with their magistrates. There is a dispute as to the practice, and we must therefore take the question before us as if there were no practice, and decide it on general principles on a proper construction of the several Acts, and particularly of the Licensing Act of 1903. We have been referred to the terms of the commission issued to Justices of the Peace to shew that in certain matters they had a concurrent jurisdiction with magistrates in such burghs, but, as has been pointed out, these terms though very wide are mainly limited to the maintenance of the peace, and nothing is said about licensing matters. As I understand, nobody disputes that in ordinary matters the jurisdiction of the Justices extends over the whole county, burgh as well as rural, but the question before us is just whether that concurrent jurisdiction covers licensing offences, and that depends on the terms of section 91 of the Act of 1903. We can derive very little aid from any other part of the Act.

That section provides—"(1) Every person who shall commit any breach of certificate, or who shall in any other manner offend against this Act, shall be prosecuted, . . . unless by this Act otherwise specially directed or authorised" (here comes in the cardinal point), "before the Sheriff or any two or more Justices of the Peace of a county, or any magistrate of a royal, parliamentary, or police burgh having jurisdiction in the county or burgh, as the case may be, in which such offender shall reside or such offence shall have been committed," and so on. There is no dispute that the Sheriff of the county has a concurrent jurisdiction with the magistrates within police burghs, but it is disputed that the Justices have such a concurrent jurisdiction. It is matter of admission that prior to the Police Act of 1862, which dealt with police burghs, Justices had jurisdiction over the areas which are now formed into police burghs, and in the ordinary case that jurisdiction is expressly reserved to them in the Act of 1862, when it created the jurisdiction of the magistrates. There is nothing in that Act to deprive the Justices of the jurisdiction they possessed over these areas by the mere fact that they have been erected into police burghs with a magisterial bench of their own.

But, then, it is said that the words "as the case may be" in section 91 of the Act of 1903 restrict the jurisdiction of the justices of a county to licensing offences committed within the county, but outwith the limits of police and other burghs. I do not think there is any difficulty in interpreting the phrase. It means that on the occurrence of any offence it shall be tried by whoever has jurisdiction over the place where the offence has been committed. If the Sheriff has jurisdiction, let the case be tried by him; if the Justices have jurisdiction, let them try it; or if the Magistrates have jurisdiction let the case be tried by them. The question just is, who has jurisdiction to try offences in ordinary cases in the county or burgh? Have the Justices, like the Sheriff, jurisdiction over the whole county, rural as well as police burghs? I think they have. Whether they have concurrent jurisdiction in cases occurring in royal or parliamentary burghs does not require to be decided in the case before us. It is sufficient for the decision of this case that the Justices admittedly had ordinary jurisdiction over these areas before they became police burghs, that nothing has happened to deprive them of that jurisdiction since, and therefore the Justices have a concurrent jurisdiction in all summary cases in such police burghs with the Magistrates.

I am of opinion that the judgment is wrong, and that we should answer the question of law in that sense.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion on all the points argued to us. It seems to me to be undoubted that immediately on the passing of the Home Drummond Act the Justices of Fife had jurisdiction to try all offences against the Licensing Statutes occurring within the area of the county which now lies in the burgh of Buckhaven. There is no doubt that this district lies within the county of Fife, and therefore the Justices of the county of Fife, and the Justices of no other county, were the Court for trial of licensing offences until the erection of the district into a police burgh by the Act of 1862—the Sheriff having a concurrent jurisdiction with them. As the jurisdiction of the Justices existed under these Acts it lies on the party denying its continued existence to shew that it has been taken away. I know of no authority except the Legislature which can take away an existing jurisdiction. We were referred to the Licensing Acts of 1862 and 1903. It was admitted by counsel for the respondent that no distinction could be taken between the language of the sections relating to this matter in these two statutes. There are variations of phraseology, but these are chiefly verbal, and are immaterial to the decision of this question. The argument may therefore be taken on either of these enactments. The substance of the argument is this, that inasmuch as provision is made for trial of licensing offences "before the Sheriff or any two or more justices of the peace of a county or any magistrate of a royal, parliamentary, or police burgh having jurisdiction in the county or burgh as the case may be, in which such offender shall reside," it is meant that the magistrates of burghs are to have exclusive jurisdiction for the trial of licensing offences committed within their bounds. Now, apart from the provisions of the licensing statutes, the mere constitution of an area of a county into a police burgh could not take away the jurisdiction which the justices had before such erection. That is to say, in other matters the justices still have concurrent jurisdiction with the magistrates of a police burgh within their county, and if that jurisdiction does not extend to licensing offences this can only be the result of some provision of the licensing statutes. But there is no evidence in the Licensing Act of 1903, or in its analogue of 1862, that any amendment was intended either for enlarging or abridging the existing jurisdiction of magistrates and justices of the peace. The words "as the case may be" are distributive words, and their effect according to known rules is to apply each subject to its proper predicate. Therefore if the county justices had a concurrent jurisdiction with the magistrates of police burghs these words are sufficient for the purpose of applying the concurrent jurisdiction to the particular case of licensing offences within the area over which that concurrent jurisdiction extends. It is not intended to treat counties as discontinuous from the burghs, or burghs as separate areas within which the justices of the county could have no concurrent jurisdiction with the magistrates. I mean that the language of the enactment is consistent with an intention not to disturb existing jurisdictions. Now, if that be so, it follows that the Justices of Fife still have within the area of the burgh of Buckhaven that concurrent jurisdiction with the magistrates which they had prior to the Licensing Act of 1903. By that statute the jurisdiction has not been taken away, and therefore when this case was brought before them the Justices were not entitled to decline jurisdiction.

No. 8.

Tasker v. Simpson.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that His Majesty's Justices of the Peace of a county have concurrent jurisdiction along with the Magistrates of a police burgh to try offences under the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, where such offences are committed within burgh by persons residing therein: Therefore answer the question in the case in the negative, sustain the appeal, and remit to the Justices to proceed."

of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, that a person charged before a Court of summary jurisdiction shall be informed of his right to be tried on indictment, applies to Scotland.

"JAMES DUNBAR, aerated water manufacturers" in Edinburgh, presented a complaint in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 to 1881, with consent of the Procurator-fiscal, against Archibald Johnston, aerated water manufacturer, Edinburgh, in which they charged the accused with a contravention of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

Upon the complaint being called in Court on 15th July 1904, the accused having appeared and having been informed by the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) that he had a right to be tried on indictment,* he required that he should be so tried. The Sheriff-substitute accordingly allowed the complaint to be withdrawn so that the accused's request might be complied with.

Thereafter Johnston was served with an indictment in the following terms:—"Archibald Johnston, aerated water manufacturer, 67 Canongate, Edinburgh, you are indicted at the instance of James Dunbar, aerated water manufacturers, 14 Maryfield, Edinburgh, with the consent and concurrence of the Right Honourable Charles Scott Dickson, His Majesty's Advocate, and the charge against you is that" (time and place libelled) "you did" (certain things libelled), "contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28), sec. 2, subsec. 2."

This indictment was signed "James Dunbar," and was also signed by the Lord Advocate as concurring.

The warrant to cite was for trial in the Sheriff Court.

At the first diet on 24th October 1904 the accused appeared and objected (1) to the instance of the indictment on the ground that the Lord Advocate was alone entitled to prosecute on indictment, and that his concurrence was not sufficient,† and also (2) to the relevancy of the indictment.

The Sheriff (Maconochie) sustained the objection to the instance, and dismissed the indictment as incompetent.

"James Dunbar" thereupon presented a bill of advocation.

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The indictment having been properly raised at the instance of the complainers, with the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, the interlocutor or judgment complained of is ill-founded, and ought to be recalled. (3) The respondent having been properly called before the Sheriff's Summary Court, on complaint by the complainers, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, and having demanded to be tried on indictment, as provided by the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, sec. 2 (6), cannot now object to the instance of the indictment, and the interlocutor or judgment complained of ought to be recalled. (4) The said interlocutor or judgment complained of is erroneous and contrary to law, in respect the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, impliedly sanction bringing indictments at the instance of private prosecutors, at least in circumstances such as those narrated.

Argued for the complainers;—Under the law prior to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, an indictment at the instance of a private prosecutor with consent of the Lord Advocate was competent.[1] Indictment was well known before public prosecution was introduced. [LORD M'LAREN referred to Maclaurin's Criminal Trials, 250, case of British Linen Company (1765).] Indictment was competent in the Sheriff Court.[2] The provisions of sec. 2 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, applied in the case of private prosecutions where as here the public had an interest. It was a sufficient safeguard against unfounded prosecutions on indictment that the Lord Advocate's concurrence was required. His concurrence was not given as matter of course.[3] By implication, prosecutions in the present form were made competent by the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. That Act authorised private prosecution.[4] The accused had a right under the Act to be tried on indictment.[5] If that were so, and if an indictment at the instance of a private prosecutor, even with concurrence of the Lord Advocate, were incompetent, then the Act was rendered nugatory. There had been four cases of prosecutions on indictment under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, in the Sheriff Court at the instance of a private prosecutor with concurrence of the Lord Advocate. The practice was therefore in the complainers' favour.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) Indictment was only competent at the instance of the Lord Advocate, and this had been the rule for at least 200 years.[6] The word indictment was sometimes loosely used in the text writers to cover both indictment and criminal letters.[7]

That was the case in the passage from Hume (vol. ii. 163) cited by the complainers. In the case there referred to criminal letters, and not indictment, was the form in fact used. (2) None of the instances of indictments at the instance of private prosecutors were Sheriff Court cases. Indictment was not competent in the Sheriff Court apart from the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, sec. 2. That section only applied to prosecutions for the public interest. In all other cases the procedure must be by way of criminal letters. Indictment at the instance of a private prosecutor was therefore not rendered competent by the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. Nor was it rendered competent by the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. No right to proceed in this way was expressly conferred by that Act, and such a right was not to be inferred by implication.

LORD ADAM.—This advocation is brought of proceedings in the Sheriff Court at the instance of the complainers against the respondent. It is a very unusual form of proceeding to bring an advocation, but no objection has been stated, and none could be taken, as it is perfectly competent. What has been brought under our notice is an indictment at the instance of the complainers, with concurrence of His Majesty's Advocate, against Archibald Johnston, an aerated water manufacturer. The complainers are designed as "James Dunbar, aerated water manufacturers," from which I conclude that they are a company. The charge against the respondent is that on 9th June 1904, at a place specified, he did by the hands of a vanman in his employment, and acting with his authority, sell to one or other of certain parties aerated waters of his own manufacture, or at least not manufactured by the complainers, to which, contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, section 2, subsection 2, a false trade description had been applied by enclosing the said aerated waters in five bottles, two of which were embossed with the words or letters "Regd. James Dunbar, 14 Maryfield, Edinburgh. D.," and the remaining three bottles were embossed with the registered trade-mark of the complainers, viz., "Dunbar's Aerated Water, 14 Maryfield, James Dunbar, Edinburgh."

The history of the proceedings is this: The charge was originally brought by way of summary complaint before the Sheriff. When the case was called the Sheriff-substitute, assuming that a certain provision of section 2, subsection 6, of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, applied to Scotland and this case, took the view that the duty lay on him of informing the respondent that he had a right to be tried on indictment if he chose. The Sheriff-substitute accordingly so informed the respondent, who thereupon claimed the right. The summary proceedings were then dropped, and this indictment was brought in the Sheriff Court, with the result that the Sheriff dismissed the indictment as incompetent. The question before us is whether that judgment was right.

Now, we have nothing to do with the previous proceedings. The only question is whether the indictment is competent or incompetent. We may be of the opinion that there is no right in an offender brought up on a summary charge in Scotland to require trial on an indictment. The statute assumes that a right exists, which may exist in England, but certainly does not in Scotland. We were informed that in England there is such a right to demand trial on indictment, when the trial would proceed before a jury, and not summarily before a Judge. I can see, therefore, how the section operates in England, but by no means am I to be held as being of the opinion that there is such a right in Scotland. With these observations, I now proceed to consider the objections to this indictment. The first objection is that the indictment is incompetent, because indictments can only competently proceed at the instance of the Lord Advocate, and not as here at the instance of a private party with concurrence of the Lord Advocate. The second objection is that even allowing that prosecution on indictment is in general competent to a private party with concurrence of the Lord Advocate, yet in this particular case, being in the Sheriff Court, such indictment is incompetent. This objection proceeds on the ground that section 2 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, which directs that prosecutions shall proceed on indictment in the Sheriff Court, does not make such indictments as this competent.

No. 9.

Dunbar v. Johnston.

I do not propose to offer any opinion on the first objection, as I think the second objection is well founded and is sufficient. With the information which is before us we are not in a position to say whether an indictment could only proceed at the instance of the Lord Advocate. The libel is, however, incompetent because it is not in proper form. It is not disputed that originally the only form in use in the Sheriff Court was that of criminal letters, and indictments were not known unless where the Lord Advocate prosecuted in exceptional instances. We are here dealing with an indictment in the Sheriff Court at the instance of a private party with concurrence of the Lord Advocate. The only authority for bringing an indictment in the Sheriff Court is the second section of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, and I do not think that it applies at all in this case. It provides that "all prosecutions for the public interest before the High Court of Justiciary and before the Sheriff Court, where the Sheriff is sitting with a jury, shall proceed on indictment in name of Her Majesty's Advocate, and in all cases in which by the existing law and practice such prosecutions proceed on criminal letters, indictment shall be used instead thereof, and such indictment may be in accordance with the forms contained in Schedule A." That clause is, beyond all question, applicable only to prosecutions for the public interest. The question, therefore, is whether this prosecution is or is not for the public interest. I think that it is for a private interest, and although there may be some indirect public interest served by the prosecution going on, yet it is not a prosecution for the public interest in the proper and technical sense. If it had been for the public interest, and at the instance of the Lord Advocate, he would have had sole control over the proceedings, but here the prosecution might be abandoned at any time without his being consulted or even against his wishes. I am of opinion that there is here no prosecution "for the public interest" in the words of the Act, but merely a private prosecution with the concurrence of the Lord Advocate. If that be so, then the question is whether the form of prosecution by indictment under section 2 of the 1887 Act applies. I am of opinion that it does not. If the prosecution is not for the public interest, there is no authority at all in this clause of the Act for a private person proceeding by an indictment. I think, therefore, that the second objection is well founded, and affords sufficient ground for refusing the bill. I am the less reluctant to sustain this objection, because we could not have decided the question on the other objection without engaging in a farther and far wider inquiry.

No. 9.

Dunbar v. Johnston.

LORD M'LAREN.—In a strict sense the real question is whether this indictment is incompetent. It is necessary, however, to look at the terms of the Act of Parliament on which it proceeds, because the Merchandise Marks Act might have authorised a proceeding which was formerly not competent in the Sheriff Court, but I do not think it has done so.

The argument addressed to us, however, had a much wider range, including some interesting topics in the history of our criminal procedure. But I hardly think we need to consider these topics, for the question is not whether indictment or criminal letters is the proper form of process in a proceeding in the High Court at the instance of a private prosecutor, but only whether this indictment is competently brought in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians.

The researches of counsel on either side of the bar have not enabled them to furnish us with a single example of an indictment in the Sheriff Court at the instance of a private prosecutor. The most modern authority to which we were referred is a passage in Sir George Mackenzie's Criminal Law, where he says that such an indictment is only competent at the instance of the procurator-fiscal of the sheriffdom.

By the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act, it is provided in substance that prosecutions for the public interest before the Sheriff Court are to proceed at the instance of His Majesty's Advocate, and it was not unnatural that when the Lord Advocate was authorised to prosecute in his own name before the Sheriff Court, he should prosecute in the form in which the chief law officer is accustomed to proceed in prosecutions before the High Court.

It is only by a very forced interpretation of the Act that it could be held to confer any right on private prosecutors to proceed by way of indictment. For a long time it was competent to proceed in Sheriff Court prosecutions by criminal letters only, but in so far as regards the substitution of indictments for criminal letters no change has been made applicable to prosecutions at the instance of private prosecutors. There are other clauses in the Act which make it unnecessary to use certain words of style, &c., and I have no doubt that these provisions would apply to private as well as to public prosecutions.

It may be said that the Merchandise Marks Act assumes a right on the part of an accused person to be tried by indictment, and no doubt an offender can be tried on indictment in Scotland if the Crown thinks that such procedure is appropriate. But I should not wish it to be assumed as entering into my opinion that any such right exists in Scotland as a right to be tried on indictment.

A magistrate may try an offender summarily, or he may commit him for trial, but if he commits him it rests with the Lord Advocate or his depute to decide whether he shall be tried on indictment in the High Court or before the Sheriff and a jury. The question is not a question of form, at least it is a case where form may become substance, and I know of no right on the part of an accused person in Scotland to insist on being tried by indictment.

No. 9.

Dec. 22, 1904.
Dunbar v. Johnston.

I do not think that in this view any violence is done to the language of the Merchandise Marks Act, for I have no difficulty in holding that it applies only to cases where the right to be tried on indictment exists, and I cannot help thinking that all this difficulty has arisen out of an attempt to apply to Scotland a provision which was meant to apply only to prosecutions in England.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree that this indictment was incompetent in the Sheriff Court, and as this is enough for the decision of the case, I do not desire to say anything on the other very interesting questions which were argued before us. But I desire, like your Lordships, that it should be understood that we are not deciding that persons prosecuted under the Merchandise Marks Act have a right to be tried on indictment if they demand it. The question is not before us for decision, but since it has been discussed at the bar, I may say that, as at present advised, it seems to me at least arguable that the proviso founded on in subsection (6) of section 2 of the Act does not confer any right, but assumes that there is or may be an existing right to be tried on indictment if the accused so requires. The magistrate is to inform the accused of his right to be tried on indictment. The section applies to both England and Scotland, and enacts that an offender may be prosecuted "in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts." Now, there are Summary Jurisdiction Acts in England and also in Scotland. Trial in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts means trial in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts in force in either country, according as the trial takes place in the one or the other. Reading the clause therefore upon the ordinary principle of construction, applicando singula singulis, it appears to me that trials in England and Scotland are to be conducted according to the procedure prescribed by the Acts in force in each of these countries respectively. Now, it appears that there is a clause in the English Summary Jurisdiction Act which confers a right to trial on indictment if it is demanded. But it is admitted that no such right is given by any Summary Procedure Act in Scotland. All that the Merchandise Marks Act says is that the magistrate is to inform the accused of his right. The record in this case states that the Sheriff informed the accused of his right to be tried on indictment, but we are not told what specific information the Sheriff gave him on the subject. But whatever be the true meaning of section 2 (6) of the Merchandise Marks Act, it does not affect the question whether this indictment was competent in the Sheriff Court, and I agree with your Lordships that it was not, and that on that ground alone the decision must be upheld.

THE COURT refused the bill.

In a prosecution for using a fixed engine to catch salmon in the Solway Firth, contrary to 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, sec. 11, and the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 33, it was found by the Sheriff that the accused were fishermen in the employment of the tenant of the salmon-fishings in question, and that they used the alleged fixed engine complained of in accordance with their master's instructions. Held that the accused were not "owners" of the fixed engine in the sense of sec. 11 of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, and were therefore not liable for penalties under that section.

HIGH COURT. Lord Adam. Lord M'Laren. Lord Kinnear.

CHARLES STEWART PHYN, solicitor, Dumfries, Clerk of the Nith District Fishery Board, brought a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright, which libelled "that Robert Kenyon and Peter Williamson, both fishermen, residing at Carsethorn, in the parish of Kirkbean and Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, did on 31st May 1904, in the Solway Firth, and at that part thereof in the parish of Kirkbean and Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, opposite the lands of Arbigland in said parish and stewartry, place and use for catching salmon a hang or drift net, being a fixed engine, contrary to the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, section 11, made applicable to the locus above libelled conform to the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 33, as amended by the Act 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 50, section 3,* whereby the said Robert Kenyon and Peter Williamson are liable to forfeiture of said net, and in addition thereto, to a penalty of £10 each for each day of so placing or using the same. . . ."

The accused stated certain objections to the competency and relevancy of the complaint, but the Sheriff-substitute (Napier) repelled these objections so far as preliminary.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and after evidence had been led, the Sheriff-substitute assoilzied them from the complaint.

The prosecutor appealed upon a stated case.

In the case the Sheriff-substitute stated that, inter alia, he found the following facts proved:—"The respondents are salmon fishermen in the employment of the tenant of Arbigland salmon-fishings . . . when fishing they use a net," which "can be used either as a draught net or as a whammel net, i.e., a hang or drift net. When it is used as a draught net it is not a fixed engine, and is admittedly used in a legal manner. But it cannot always be so used, profitably at least, and the respondents have instructions from the tenant when they cannot use the net as a draught net to use it as a whammel net. When so used it is said to be used in an illegal manner. . . . On 31st May 1904, about 8 A.M. . . . the respondents . . . when at a considerable distance from the shore shot a net, of the dimensions above described, outwards towards the sea or English coast, from a boat opposite Arbigland and on the Arbigland fishing, and so used the net as a whammel net." "I held that the net used was not a fixed engine, and assoilzied the accused."

* Section 11 of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, and section 33 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97), are quoted in Lord Adam's opinion infra, p. 48. The amendment made by section 3 of the Act 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 50, merely alters the citation of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109.

The following question, inter alia, was put to the Court:—"(3) Whether in the circumstances the respondents were properly assoilzied?"

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The respondents in this case are charged with having on 31st May 1904 in the Solway Firth, and at a part thereof in the parish of Kirkbean and stewartry of Kirkcudbright, opposite the lands of Arbigland in the said parish, placed and used for catching salmon a hang or drift net, being a fixed engine, contrary to the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, section 11, made applicable to the locus above libelled, conform to the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 33, as amended by the Act 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 50, section 3, which is merely a verbal amendment.

Section 11 of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, which is an English Act, and does not extend to Scotland, enacts:—"No fixed engine of any description shall be placed or used for catching salmon in any inland or tidal waters; and any engine placed or used in contravention of this section may be taken possession of or destroyed; and any engine so placed or used, and any salmon taken by such engine shall be forfeited, and in addition thereto the owner of any engine placed or used in contravention of this section shall" incur certain penalties.

By the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, Commissioners were appointed, whose duty it was, inter alia, section 6 (1), "to fix and define, for the purposes of this Act and the other Acts relating to salmon and salmon fisheries in Scotland, the natural limits which divide each river in Scotland (including the estuary thereof) from the sea, in so far as the same may not be already fixed by statute or by judicial decision," and section 6 (2), "to fix, for the purposes of this Act, the limits of the Solway Firth, having regard to" the Act 44 Geo. III. cap. 45 (the Solway Fishing Act).

The 33d section of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, enacts:—"From and after the 1st day of January 1865 the provisions of" the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 109, "shall extend and apply to salmon fisheries in the waters and on the shores of the Solway Firth situate in Scotland, as the same may be fixed by authority of this Act, and to the rivers flowing into the same, in so far as such provisions relate to the use of fixed engines for the taking of salmon."

It is clear, therefore, that section 11 of the English Act, a breach of which is complained of, is not made applicable by the Scottish Act to fishing in the Solway Firth generally, but only to fishing in such portion thereof as may have been fixed by the Commissioners. But this complaint is an entire blank as to whether the Commissioners have ever fixed to what fisheries in the waters or on the shores of the Solway Firth situated in Scotland the Act shall be applicable, or that it has been made applicable by the Commissioners to the fishings in question. On that ground I think that this complaint is quite irrelevant.

But further, by section 6, subsection 1, of the Fisheries (Scotland) Act, the Commissioners were directed to fix and define for the purposes of the Act the natural limits which divide each river,—including the estuary thereof,—from the sea. The Commissioners by bye-law, dated 26th April 1864, approved by the Secretary of State on 25th August 1864, which came into force on 7th March 1865, fixed a common estuary for the Nith, the Annan, and the Esk, and fixed and defined the limits which divided it from the sea to be a straight line drawn from the hotel of Skinberness in the parish of Abbey Holme in the county of Cumberland to the large house at Carsethorn of Arbigland in the county of Kirkcudbright. It is obvious that the Solway Firth opposite Arbigland is partly estuary and partly sea. To charge the respondents, therefore, as is done in this case, with fishing with a fixed engine opposite the lands of Arbigland is not necessarily charging them with any offence. If they were fishing on one side of the line they were fishing in the sea and were committing no offence; if on the other side, that should have been libelled in the complaint.

The 11th section of the Act applies only to the owner of the engine complained of, and the forfeitures and penalties are imposed only upon him. It is not set forth in the complaint that the respondents are the owners of the nets the use of which is complained of. They are merely designed as fishermen. It was held, however, in the case of Marshall v. Phyn,[1] on the construction of this section of the Act, that it was not a good objection to the relevancy of the libel that it did not state that the respondent was the owner of the engine, and that, if he were not owner the onus lay upon him to prove it. In giving judgment in that case the late Lord Justice-General said,[2]—"It seems to me that the word 'owner' in the statute is used in a somewhat large sense. It does not in my view necessarily mean the person in whom the technical right of property in the nets is vested. The meaning of the statute is, in my judgment, that the person against whom proceedings are to be taken shall not be, e.g., a servant fishing in the employment of another, but the person who has the lawful possession and control of the nets, whether he is technically the proprietor of them or not."

Now, the Sheriff has found in fact that the respondents are salmon fishermen in the employment of the tenant of the Arbigland salmon-fishings, and that when the net is used as a whammel or drift net it is by his instructions. That being so, it is clear to me that the respondents are not "owners" of the net in the sense of the statute, and that section 11 has no application to them, and that they were on that ground rightly assoilzied by the Sheriff; and I think that we should answer the third question, which is enough for the disposal of this case, in the affirmative.

I am not disposed, and I do not think it necessary, to answer the second question, which asks whether a drift or hang net is a fixed engine within the meaning of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861. It is clear that the proper respondents in such a case are the owners of the engine complained of, but the owners are not parties to this case, the respondents being, as the Sheriff says, merely their servants. I therefore think that we should find it unnecessary to answer the second question, the more especially as it is asked in a case the libel in which, in my view, is quite irrelevant.

As regards the first question I do not understand what particular question of law it is intended to raise, and I think we should decline to answer it also.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the third question in the case in the affirmative: Find it unnecessary to answer the first and second questions: Dismiss the appeal, and decern."

JOHN TODD, Complainer.—T. B. Morison.
JAMES MAGOWAN, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Salvesen—Young.

Jurisdiction—Civil or Criminal—Suspension—Competency—Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 28.—The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 28, distinguishes between criminal and civil complaints thus:—(1) Complaints in which the Court may pronounce sentence of imprisonment, or in default of payment of a penalty may grant warrant for the imprisonment of the respondent for a period limited to a certain time, at the expiration of which he shall be entitled to liberation—are to be deemed criminal. (2) Other complaints are to be deemed civil.

In a complaint for recovery of a penalty under an Act by which the Court was not authorised to pronounce sentence of imprisonment, or in default of payment of the penalty to grant a warrant of imprisonment for a specified time, the Court granted a warrant to imprison the respondent for one month unless the penalty should be sooner paid.

Held that the complaint was civil, and that a suspension in the High Court of Justiciary was incompetent.

Summary Procedure—Sentence—Imprisonment—Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 18 (6).—The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 18 (6), enacts that, in complaints for contravention of an Act of Parliament which imposes a penalty for contravention but contains no special provision for the recovery thereof or for the substitution of a term of imprisonment in default of payment, the judgment of the Court shall authorise execution by arrestment, poinding and sale, and imprisonment (unless recovery by imprisonment is excluded by the terms of the Act), "and the warrant of imprisonment to be granted in pursuance of any such judgment . . . shall authorise the detention of the respondent until liberated in due course of law."

Opinion per cur. that the section does not authorise the granting of a warrant for the detention of a respondent "for" a specified term "unless the penalty shall be sooner paid."

Summary Procedure—Sentence—Imprisonment—Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 18 (6), Schedule K (6).—Schedule K (6) of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, supplies (in cases where it is inexpedient to issue a warrant of arrestment, poinding and sale) a form of warrant for imprisonment, in default of payment of a penalty, for a specified period, unless the penalty be paid before its termination, but provides that this form is only to be used "where the Acts founded on authorise imprisonment for a specified period."

Opinion per cur. that the words "authorise imprisonment" could not be read as "do not exclude imprisonment," and that consequently it was not competent to use this form of warrant in a case where the Act imposing the penalty did not authorise imprisonment for a specified period in default of payment.

HIGH COURT. (Full Bench). Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Kinnear. Ld. Kyllachy. Lord Kincairney.

JAMES MAGOWAN, officer of Inland Revenue at Brechin (prosecuting for His Majesty by order of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue), brought a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, in the Justice of the Peace Court at Montrose, against John Todd, master of the vessel "Thistle" of Dundee. The complaint set forth that Todd had been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the 3d section of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 47 (the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828), as amended by the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 66), and concluded that he was thereby "liable to forfeit the penalty of £10 provided by the 3d section of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 47." *

prosecution. Suspension was therefore incompetent.[1] On the merits—(1) The Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828,[2] did not itself prescribe the way in which the penalty imposed by sec. 3 was to be recovered, but it was an Excise statute, and the penalty was therefore recoverable as provided by the Excise Management Act, 1827, secs. 89 and 90.[3] The Summary Jurisdiction Acts now applied to Revenue prosecutions.[4] Therefore the provisions of sec. 6 (b) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, applied here. That section authorised imprisonment for a specified period corresponding to the amount of the penalty. The result was that, although the Act of 1828 did not itself authorise imprisonment for a specified period, yet reading together with it secs. 89 and 90 of the Act of 1827, and sec. 6 (b) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, and secs. 18 (6) and 19 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864,[5] a sentence of imprisonment for a specified period was authorised by the Acts founded on, and consequently the sentence here pronounced was perfectly competent. [The LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL referred to Murray v. Jones.[6]] That decision was precisely in point, and in favour of the respondent. (2) It was a matter absolutely within the discretion of the Justices whether an adjournment should or should not be granted.

Argued for the complainer;—On competency—The grounds of suspension here were (1) that the sentence was ultra vires; and (2) oppression. A suspension upon such grounds was not excluded by sec. 79 of the Excise Management Act, 1827.[7] Mackenzie v. Martin[8] was decided not in accordance with any general rule but upon its own special circumstances. On the merits—(1) The refusal of an adjournment in the circumstances averred here amounted to oppression. (2) It was incompetent and ultra vires for the Justices in this case to grant warrant for imprisonment in the second alternative form of Schedule K (6). (a) The Act founded on in the prosecution was the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828, sec. 3. That enactment did not authorise imprisonment for a specified period, and therefore the proviso at the end of the form used applied and made it incompetent to use that form here. Sec. 3 of the 1828 Act did not authorise imprisonment at all. It only authorised recovery of £10 as a debt. No doubt it was a debt which even yet might be enforced by imprisonment under sec. 4 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), but that was imprisonment as a civil debtor. (b) Even if sec. 90 of the Excise Management Act, 1827, was to be regarded by implication as founded on in the prosecution, it did not authorise imprisonment for a specified period. What it authorised was imprisonment until the penalty had been paid if the amount could not be recovered by poinding. (c) The effect of secs. 6 and 8 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, in such a case as the present was at most only to authorise imprisonment for a specified period failing recovery by poinding, &c., and these sections did not authorise the Justices, without granting a warrant for poinding, &c., to pronounce a sentence of imprisonment for a specified period on failure to pay the penalty.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is a suspension at the instance of John Todd, captain of the vessel named the "Thistle," against a conviction for a contravention of the conditions of a licence certificate granted to him under certain Acts, the contravention being that upon the steamer which was making a coast voyage on a Sunday spirits were sold. The complaint was served upon the suspender, and for perfectly good reasons he was not able to be present at the date which was originally fixed for the trial. He communicated with the prosecutor upon that matter, and was led to understand that there would be a postponement of the inquiry. But the postponement was, as matter of fact, not granted, and he was convicted without an opportunity of being heard in his own defence. I cannot disguise from myself that I think that was a somewhat hard measure upon this person in respectable circumstances at the time. He had perfectly good reasons connected with official business for being away, and I think this postponement ought to have been granted. But I am not of opinion that upon that ground we should have interfered with the conviction, because this is an Exchequer prosecution, and there are, as your Lordships are aware and as was pleaded in the suspension, very minute provisions as to appeals under Exchequer prosecutions which, in a matter of this sort, I think ought to have been taken advantage of if the point were to be raised, and therefore, on the question raised there, I do not think the conviction could be disturbed.

But there is another objection of a more formidable nature which arises on the sentence. The conviction is given in the print, and it is in these terms:—"The Justices, in respect of the evidence adduced, convict the said John Todd of the contravention charged, and therefore adjudge him to forfeit and pay the sum of £10 sterling of penalty; and in respect it is inexpedient to issue a warrant of poinding and sale, ordain execution by imprisonment after the lapse of three days from this date; and grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend the said John Todd, and convey him to the prison of Montrose, and to the keeper thereof to receive and detain him for the period of one month from the date of his imprisonment, unless the said penalty shall be sooner paid." Now, the section of the statute under which the conviction is sought is the third section of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 47, applied to the particular case by certain other sections of other statutes which are set forth in the complaint, and which I need not specify, because they are only sections of application. The point is that the section which creates the offence and provides for the penalty of £10 does not authorise any imprisonment, and does not provide any method for recovering the penalty. Accordingly, when we turn to the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, under which these proceedings are brought, the section which deals with these matters is section 18, and there are various subsections. I do not read the earlier subsections, because your Lordships are familiar with them, but it is sufficient to say that they provide for a variety of cases which are not this. And then we come to subsection 6, and the beginning of subsection 6 is this—"In complaints for the contravention of any Act of Parliament, under which the accused is or shall be liable to a penalty, and where no special provision is made for the recovery thereof, or for the substitution of a term of imprisonment in default of payment." Now, that is the case on hand. Then the section goes on to say,—"The judgment of the Court shall authorise execution by arrestment, poinding and sale, and imprisonment (unless recovery by imprisonment is excluded by the terms of the Act), and may be in the form No. 6 in the said schedule" (namely, Schedule K), and I ask your Lordships' particular attention to these words, "and the warrant of imprisonment to be granted in pursuance of any such judgment may be in the said form No. 6, and shall authorise the detention of the respondent until liberated in due course of law." I need scarcely point out to your Lordships that here there is no authorised detention until liberated in course of law, but, on the contrary, there is a specified term of imprisonment. The prosecutor has been probably, I think, misled here by the construction of Schedule K in regard to No. 6, and also by a judgment which I shall have occasion to comment on in a moment. Going back to form No. 6—that is the authorised form—form No. 6 provides for the penalty and for the authorisation of poinding, and then there is a warrant of imprisonment to be granted to the officers of Court on their seeing that the penalty has not been recovered under the arrestment and poinding. And that is an echo of what the statute said, viz., authorising the detention of the respondent until liberated in due course of law; because the form is, "Grants warrant to officers of Court to apprehend the said J. K., and convey him to the prison of , and to the keeper thereof to receive and detain him until liberated in due course of law." Then there is an asterisk appended to that form of the schedule, which is, "If at the hearing it shall appear that the issuing of a warrant of arrestment, poinding, and sale would be inexpedient, then, in place of the warrant annexed to the judgment in the preceding form, say." And then comes the warrant which is incorporated in the sentence in this case, but there is an addendum at the end of it—"This form only to be used where the Acts founded on authorise imprisonment for a specified period." Now, of course it is quite clear that the Act here founded on does not authorise imprisonment for a specified period, and accordingly I should have thought that perfectly clear had it not been for the judgment in Murray v. Jones, which is reported in 2 Couper, p. 284, in which the late Lord Moncreiff in giving the leading judgment of the Court held that "authorise" was equivalent to "did not exclude." Of course we are in a position, having sat here as a larger Bench, to review that judgment, and I am bound to say I do not think it can be supported. Doubts are thrown on it in a text book written by Lord Moncreiff, now no longer with us on the Bench, and I think the doubts there expressed are well founded. After one reads the judgment of the late Lord Moncreiff in Murray v. Jones[1] it is perfectly clear, for his Lordship so expresses it, that he came to the conclusion he did because he thought that if you read the word "authorise" in its natural sense, then there would be no prosecution under subsection 6 to which the form with the asterisk could apply. In coming to that conclusion I think his Lordship omitted for the moment to read the latter portion of subsection 6. If the form of subsection 6 was limited to the portion I have read, that proposition would be true; but subsection 6 not only deals with a case such as this where there is no special provision made for the recovery of the penalty or substitution of imprisonment, but it also goes on to deal with cases—I am now reading the concluding portion of subsection 6—"In all cases where, under the authority of any Act of Parliament such penalty is or shall be declared to be recoverable by arrestment, poinding or distress and sale, or imprisonment, or by any combination of those forms of diligence other than as above provided for, the judgment of the Court may be expressed in the said form No. 6 so far as applicable, and no warrant of imprisonment shall be issued after a judgment in such form until after the period allowed for execution by arrestment or poinding except in the event mentioned in the said form No. 6." So that it is quite clear that what I might call the latter or alternative portion of the schedule of the form No. 6 is really applicable and useful to the concluding portion of subsection 6 and not to the first portion at all. That being so, it seems to me that this conviction is clearly bad.

But while I think that, at the same time it has a somewhat peculiar result, which is this, that if you turn to sec. 28 of the Summary Procedure Act it seems to me to be perfectly clear that having arrived at the view that I have done on the conviction, the complainer here has mistaken the Court for his remedy. Under sec. 28 it is perfectly clear that this conviction ought to have been attacked by civil suspension, because the criterion under sec. 28 which determines civil and criminal review goes not according to what is done but according to what ought to be done or can be done by the magistrate; and, considering as I have done what ought and could be done under this section, I am at once led to the conclusion that the suspension here is civil.

The result of course would be that I do not think this Court has jurisdiction to quash the conviction, but as at the same time I think the conviction undoubtedly bad, and as sitting in another Court I would be prepared to suspend the conviction to-morrow, I put it to the Solicitor-General, as the Court has held so strongly as to this person not having a chance to defend himself, whether he would not undertake to recommend the Crown to repay the fine and make a moderate award of expenses.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordship has expressed the view I entertain most fully, and I have nothing to add.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. Kyllachy. LdStormonth-Darling.

CHARLES ROBERT PATERSON, residing at Castlewigg House, Whithorn, Wigtownshire, brought a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, in the Sheriff Court at Wigtown, against Edward Saunders, farm servant, California, Whithorn, Wigtownshire, and four other persons, in which the prosecutor set forth that the accused "did on the 23d day of October 1904 trespass in the daytime within the meaning of the Act 2 and 3 William IV. caput 68, in a wood on the estate of Castlewigg . . . known as 'Culloden Wood,' without leave of the proprietor . . . or of the complainer, who is tenant of the shootings in said wood, or of any other person entitled to give leave, in search or pursuit of game, conies, or rabbits, contrary to the said Act 2 and 3 William IV. caput 68, section 1, whereby the said Edward Saunders," and the other four persons accused "are each liable to forfeit and pay any sum of money not exceeding £2 as to your Lordship shall seem meet."

On 14th November 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Watson) convicted the accused of the contravention charged, and sentenced each of them to pay 2s. of penalty, and 8s. of expenses, with the alternative of ten days' imprisonment.

The accused appealed upon a stated case.

In the case the Sheriff-substitute stated as follows:—

"After evidence was given by one witness (David Ross) for the prosecution, a second witness (M'Connell) was called, and of consent of both parties, he was held as corroborating Ross in full, and the respondent closed his case.

"One of the appellants then began to give evidence on their behalf, but their agent did not proceed with his evidence, but withdrew the witness and also closed his case.

"The agent for the respondent addressed the Court and thereafter the agent for the defence after addressing the Court on the want of evidence of the respondent's title, moved that the complaint should be dismissed in respect that respondent had failed to prove that he was shooting tenant of the wood in question, and had thus failed to qualify a title to prosecute the complaint.

"I then recalled David Ross, the first witness for the prosecution, for the purpose of remedying this omission in the evidence. The appellants' agent objected to the witness being recalled, on the ground that the prosecutor had closed his case and had been heard in debate. I then informed the appellants' agent that if he had closed his case under a misapprehension, I would allow him to reopen it and proceed with his evidence. At the same time I indicated that if he availed himself of the opportunity so given and if his purpose was to put each of the five accused into the witness-box, I desired first to recall M'Connell, the second witness for the prosecution (whom the parties had agreed to hold as concurring with Ross, the first witness) in order that he might be separately examined. The appellants' agent agreed to this course without prejudice to his right to insist in the objection stated to the recall of the witness Ross. M'Connell was accordingly recalled, examined and cross-examined, after which the appellants each gave evidence on their own behalf. It was proved that the respondent was game tenant of the estate of Castlewigg, which includes 'Culloden Wood,' that the appellants, who had two dogs with them, beat the bushes in the said wood with sticks and hunted with dogs, and that a freshly killed rabbit was found on one of the appellants."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Is the complaint irrelevant . . . (c) because of incorrect statement of the statutory penalties in the body of the complaint?* (2) Whether both the respondent and the appellants having closed their proof and argued the case, I was then entitled ex proprio motu to recall a witness for the prosecution to prove the respondent's title?" *

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The Game (Scotland) Act, 1832,† sec. 1, imposed different penalties for two different offences. The offence set forth in the complaint was the second of these two offences, for five persons were alleged to have participated in the trespass libelled. But the penalty concluded for was the penalty imposed for the offence first mentioned in the section. The complaint was therefore irrelevant in respect that the penalty was incorrectly stated. (2) The Sheriff-substitute at the stage and in the circumstances stated was not entitled to recall a witness.[1] It was essential that the prosecutor's title to prosecute should be proved.[2]

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon to reply with regard to the first question.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff-substitute was entitled to recall a witness at the stage and in the circumstances stated.[3] But the prosecutor's title having been set forth in the complaint, and no objection having been taken to it at the outset it was not necessary that his title should be proved.[4]

LORD KYLLACHY.—In this case the only objections pressed upon us were (1) that the penalties were not correctly specified in the body of the complaint; and (2) that the Sheriff was not entitled to recall a certain witness to supply a certain alleged defect in the complainer's proof.

As to the first point, we did not call for a reply, being satisfied that the prosecutor was quite entitled to limit himself, if he chose, to the minor offence and the minor penalty.

As to the second point, what we have to decide is whether we are prepared to affirm the proposition that in such circumstances as occurred here it was ultra vires of the Sheriff, or other summary Judge, to recall a witness after proof on both sides had been closed. Now, I am not prepared so to hold. I am not prepared to do so even assuming in the appellants' favour that a material omission had been made in the complainer's proof, and that the effect of what the Sheriff did was to supply that omission. I am not prepared to say that even on that assumption the Sheriff was disabled, if he thought fit, from recalling the witness. I think it would be difficult to say so, having in view the terms of the Evidence Act of 1852,[1] and the decision of this Court in the case of Collison.[2]

But further, and this is sufficient, I do not see my way to affirm that it was necessary for the private prosecutor—in a case like the present—where his title was set forth in the complaint and no objection had been taken to it at the outset, to prove the title so set forth. There is at least some authority to the contrary in the case of Lees v. Macdonald,[3] authority from which, as at present advised, I see no reason to differ.

We therefore answer the first question in the negative in all its branches. With respect to the second question, we answer in the affirmative. With regard to the third question, we heard no argument. It was not explained to us to what it referred, and we do not require to deal with it.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD STORMONTH-DARLING concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

On 11th August 1904 a boy of eleven was summoned to appear on 15th August in a Burgh Police Court to answer to a charge of theft. The summons was handed to the boy's mother in her shop, and a copy of the complaint was served at the same time. The boy's father was not present. On 15th August the boy appeared in Court, but neither his father nor his mother attended the Court. The boy pleaded guilty. The prosecutor then withdrew the charge of theft, and the magistrate granted an order for the detention of the boy in an industrial school until he attained the age of sixteen.

that the order for the detention of the boy in the industrial school was oppressive, in respect that it had been pronounced without notice to the father, held that the order was not in the circumstances oppressive, and suspension refused.

ON 11th August 1904 Isaac Hunter, a boy of eleven years of age, son of and residing with William Hunter, fruiterer, 44 Back Temple-hill, Troon, was, along with four other boys, summoned to appear on 15th August in the Burgh Police Court, Troon, to answer to a summary complaint at the instance of the burgh prosecutor charging the boys with stealing from an automatic machine twenty-four cakes of sweetmeats of the value of 2s.

On 15th August the boys appeared, and all of them pleaded guilty. The prosecutor then withdrew the charge of theft against Isaac Hunter, and he was dealt with under section 15 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866,* and sent to the Certified Industrial School at Kilmarnock, there to be detained until he should attain sixteen years of age. The other boys were fined 2s. 6d. each with the alternative of 24 hours' imprisonment. The fines were paid.

Isaac Hunter and his father William Hunter, as his tutor and administrator-in-law, brought a bill of suspension of the order for detention of Isaac Hunter in the industrial school and for his liberation.

They stated;—(Stat. 3) On the evening of Thursday 11th August 1904, a summons calling upon the complainer Isaac Hunter to appear in the Police Court on the 15th August following to answer to a charge of theft was handed to Mrs Hunter, the boy's mother, in her shop. A copy of the complaint was served at the same time. "The complainer William Hunter was not present on the occasion . . . and was not communicated with by the police." (Stat 4) "In the belief that the Magistrate would simply admonish or otherwise leniently treat the complainer the said Isaac Hunter (against whom there had been no previous complaint), neither the said Mrs Hunter nor the complainer William Hunter was present in Court when the said complaint was called on 15th August 1904; and the said Isaac Hunter was not otherwise represented. The complainer the said Isaac Hunter, as well as the said other boys, pleaded guilty. . . . In the case of the complainer the said Isaac Hunter the Magistrate referred to the annoyance, in the shape of absence from school, caused by the said complainer to the local school board, of which the said Magistrate is believed to have been at the time a member. The respondent having thereupon withdrawn the charge against the complainer the said Isaac Hunter," the Magistrate then pronounced the order under suspension. (Stat. 5) "The said proceedings, in so far as affecting the complainer the said Isaac Hunter, were irregular, unwarrantable, harsh, and oppressive, and prejudicial to the complainers. The respondent was well aware that the complainer, Isaac Hunter, was the son of a respectable working man in Troon, who should at least have had the opportunity of being heard in regard to the proposal to send the said boy to an industrial school. The foresaid charge was of a trifling character. . . . In any event, the said Magistrate was not justified, on the ground assigned by him as above stated, in imposing so severe a penalty upon the complainer the said Isaac Hunter. It was harsh and oppressive. The complainer William Hunter and his said wife are quite able to take charge of the said Isaac Hunter at home, and are prepared to do so. The said boy is in delicate health, and requires his mother's attention. This would have been explained to the Magistrate had the said boy's parents been consulted in regard to said order."

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The order complained of being, in the circumstances condescended on, unwarrantable and irregular, the complainers are entitled to have same quashed, and the complainer the said Isaac Hunter is entitled to liberation. (2) The said order being, in the circumstances stated, harsh and oppressive, it should be quashed, the complainer the said Isaac Hunter liberated, and the respondent found liable in expenses.

The burgh prosecutor lodged answers. He stated;—(Ans. 3) "The summons and execution are referred to. Admitted that the complainer William Hunter was not present on the occasion. Explained that the constable who served the complaint specially warned Mrs Hunter that the complainer William Hunter or she must attend with their son in the Police Court on the following Monday." (Ans. 4) "Admitted that neither Mr nor Mrs Hunter was present in Court on 15th August 1904. . . . Explained that the parents of the other four boys were all present in Court, stated that they had punished their children for the theft, and undertook to look more carefully after them in future. Explained that Isaac Hunter, as was well known to the Magistrate on the bench, as well as the other members of his family, were extremely irregular in their attendance at school. . . ." (Ans. 5) "Denied. . . . Explained that the detention order was pronounced by the Magistrate in the belief entertained by him, on reasonable grounds, from his knowledge of the family history, that Isaac Hunter was persistently neglected by his parents, and that it was in his interest that he should be sent to a certified industrial school, where he would be properly taught, trained, clothed, lodged, and fed."

The respondent pleaded;—The order complained of having been pronounced regularly, and in the due exercise of the Magistrate's discretion, the suspension should be refused.

The undernoted authorities were cited at the hearing.[1]

LORD M'LAREN.—The complaint in this case states that the boy having been brought before the magistrates on a charge of theft, and having pleaded guilty, was sent to an industrial school instead of being sentenced to imprisonment or fined. There are various conditions under which children may be sent to industrial schools. There is the provision applicable to children who may be found begging or wandering about without any fixed occupation or place of abode, there is the provision applicable to destitute children, and there is this provision applicable to children who have not been well brought up, and who have fallen into the commission of petty crimes.

In cases that have come before this Court by bill of suspension the principle has been laid down that although the statute founded on does not require or prescribe a form of notice to parents, yet in the case of a parent whose address is known, and still more if he is a well conducted person, it is just and equitable that notice ought to be given him before such a serious interference with his parental rights is decreed by law. These decisions no doubt are well founded, and in similar circumstances my opinion would be in entire concurrence with them—that where the father is known, and where it is possible that he might be able to state circumstances that would affect the decision of the Magistrate, he ought to be informed and to have an opportunity of appearing before a detention order is pronounced.

But these decisions must not be taken as establishing an absolute right to notice or as having the force of a statutory provision. All that has been laid down is, that where it is inequitable that a detention order should be pronounced without notice to the parent, the Court will set aside the order.

In the present case I am unable to say that the proceedings were inequitable. The boy was brought up on a charge of theft, and was proceeded against in the most formal way—that is to say, by summons regularly served. The father was bound to know that his son was to be tried on a charge of theft. If he took any interest in the welfare of his son he would naturally be present, if for no other purpose at least to endeavour to obtain mitigation of sentence. He knew that the charge was a serious one, because, however insignificant the value of the article stolen, it is always a serious thing for a boy entering on the business of life to have a conviction for theft against him in the books of the Police Court. The father knew that this was the charge, and if he did not take the trouble to attend, I do not think he can be afterwards heard to say that it was inequitable that a detention order had been pronounced without further communication being made to him.

I have no reason to suppose that if the boy's father had been in attendance a different order would have been pronounced. Nothing that has been said would suggest to my mind that this was not a suitable case for sending the boy to a certified industrial school, and this being an appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court, I am of opinion that the order pronounced should stand.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I am not disposed to dissent in this case. I certainly see nothing oppressive in the conduct of the Magistrate here. I recognise the difficulty of holding that, under section 15 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, notice to the parent of a proposal to send a child to an industrial school is a legal requirement, but I do think that it would be expedient in practice not to make such an order without giving the parent or guardian of a child, if he be accessible, an opportunity of appearing and stating any circumstances which might influence the Magistrate in coming to a decision on that matter.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with both your Lordships. I think it would be advisable in such cases for the Magistrate to act with great care, so that it might not subsequently be brought forward as an objection that he had acted without the whole facts being before him. I am clearly of opinion that the procedure adopted here is not oppressive in a case such as this where a summons has been served, and where a parent does not choose to appear and so give evidence of a reasonable and natural interest in the welfare of his child. If a parent does not choose to appear in Court I think the Magistrate is entitled to assume that the parent leaves it to him to deal with the child as may seem most suitable to him under the circumstances. I am of opinion that suspension ought to be refused, as this case is one quite distinguishable from the cases quoted on behalf of the complainers.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. Ld Stormonth-Darling.

ON 20th August 1904, Hurst, Nelson, & Company, Limited, waggon-builders, Motherwell, were cited to appear in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton, on 30th August, to answer to a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864[1] and 1881,[2] and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,[3] at the instance of William Beith Lauder, inspector of factories, Glasgow, setting forth that the accused had contravened section 10 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, by failing to maintain in an efficient state the fencing of certain dangerous parts of the machinery in their factory, "whereby the said Hurst, Nelson, & Company, Limited, as occupiers of the said factory, are liable for said contravention to a fine not exceeding ten pounds (Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, section 135), together with the reasonable costs and charges of conviction."

The complaint prayed the Sheriff "to grant warrant to cite the said Hurst, Nelson, & Company, Limited, to appear before you to answer to this complaint, and thereafter to convict them of the aforesaid contravention, and to adjudge them to suffer the penalties provided by the said Factory and Workshop Act, as the same may be modified or affected by the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881."

On 30th August, Hurst, Nelson, & Company's secretary appeared on their behalf and stated certain objections to the relevancy of the complaint, including "(Fourth) The specification of statutory penalties is erroneous, misleading, and ambiguous."

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown) sustained the fourth objection and dismissed the complaint.

The prosecutor appealed to the High Court of Justiciary on a stated case.

The question of law was,—"Is the complaint as laid relevant?"

The respondents objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the jurisdiction was civil within the meaning of section 28 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, and consequently that the appeal, under section 7 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875,[1] ought to have been to the Court of Session, and not to the Court of Justiciary.

Argued for the respondents in support of their objection to the competency of the appeal;—Upon a construction of section 28 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and section 7 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, it had been decided by this Court in North British Railway Co. v. Dumbarton Harbour Board,[2] and by the First Division of the Court of Session in Simpson v. Corporation of Glasgow,[3] that where imprisonment could not follow upon a summary complaint by reason of the respondents being an incorporated company and therefore incapable of imprisonment, the jurisdiction was civil, not criminal, in the sense of section 28 of the Act of 1864, and therefore that an appeal in such a case must under section 7 of the Act of 1875 be to the Court of Session, and not to this Court. It was said that the distinction between civil and criminal jurisdiction, as defined by section 28 of the Act of 1864, had in effect been abolished quoad appeals under the Act of 1875, by section 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, section 44 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, and section 1 of the Statute Law Revision Act, 1894,[4] none of which had been before either Court in deciding the cases just cited, and that all appeals under the Act of 1875 must now be to this Court. But that argument was considered and rejected by the Second Division of the Court of Session in Braid v. Swan & Sons, Limited.[5] It had therefore been settled by decision that an appeal in a case like the present was incompetent in this Court. The respondents had not prorogated the jurisdiction by acquiescing in the statements made in the case. The Act of 1875, section 3, gave the right of appeal to "either party," and it was for the appellant to see that he chose the right Court to which to appeal.

Argued for the appellant;—The appeal had rightly been taken to this Court. If the question could be regarded as an open one, the true test for distinguishing between criminal and civil jurisdiction as defined by section 28 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, was that proposed by Lord Moncreiff in expressing his dissent in the case of the North British Railway Co. v. Dumbarton Harbour Board,[6] namely, that the question depended, not upon the manner in which the complainer thought fit to frame his complaint, nor upon the position or special circumstances of the respondent, but upon the punishment which was authorised by the special or general statute for the particular offence, that in short the punishment which was the test of criminal jurisdiction was a quality of the offence charged, not an accident dependent on the terms of the complaint or the position of the respondent. That construction of section 28 of the Act of 1864 was in accordance with the practice that had up to that time prevailed, as was shewn by the cases that were cited in the subsequent case of Simpson,[1] although not in the case of the North British Railway Co.[2] It was, however, rejected by a majority in this Court in the latter case, and that decision was followed by the First Division in the case of Simpson.[3] But even if it was too late to go back upon the construction of section 28 of the Act of 1864, there remained the question whether the test thus held to have been enacted by section 28 had not been abolished quoad appeals under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875—to the effect of making all such appeals competent only to this Court—by section 9, subsection 4, of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, and section 1 of the Statute Law Revision Act, 1894, which sections had not been under the consideration of the Court in either of the two cases just cited. It was true that the argument founded on these sections was rejected by the Second Division of the Court of Session in the later case of Braid,[4] but that decision, which was the decision of a majority, was not binding on this Court, and was inconsistent with the decision in Lindsay v. Low & Co.,[5] where section 9, subsection (4), of the Act of 1881 was cited, and in which this Court, while not determining the question of jurisdiction, proceeded to decide the merits of the appeal, which the Court would not have done had any serious doubt as to the jurisdiction been entertained on the Bench. The question therefore must be regarded as still open in this Court. On a sound construction of the statutes this appeal was competent. In any view, the respondents had prorogated the jurisdiction by consenting to the stated case.[6]

LORD M'LAREN.—The question as to which of the two, the Court of Session or the Court of Justiciary, has jurisdiction in appeals of this kind was first raised in the Court of Justiciary, and the decision was that the jurisdiction is not of a criminal nature where the prosecution is directed against a company, because a company cannot suffer a sentence of imprisonment. If the question were open, much might be said for the other construction, because it is more convenient that the jurisdiction should be determined by the effect of the enactment contravened rather than by the status of the person who is accused of the contravention. In both Divisions of the Court of Session the judgment in the Court of Justiciary has been followed. It is true that in the case of Lindsay v. Low & Co.,[5] this Court gave a judgment which is said to be inconsistent with the previous decisions, but I rather infer that in the particular case the objection to the jurisdiction had been waived or was not insisted on. In the state of the authorities we cannot come to a contrary conclusion unless we were to refer the question to a larger Court, and in my opinion the question is not of sufficient moment to make a rehearing necessary or expedient. On the contrary, it is better to follow the authorities, because once the rule is fixed there is no difficulty in applying it. No doubt can be raised in the mind of the prosecutor, for there never can be any doubt as to whether a sentence of imprisonment can follow the conviction of a trading company. I think, therefore, that the objection should be sustained.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD STORMONTH-DARLING concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

Sheriff—Small-Debt Court—Proof—Reference to oath—Refusal to hear statement by deponent on oath—Appeal—Deviation from statutory enactments—Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837 (1 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 31.—In an action in the Small-Debt Court the pursuer's claim was referred to the defender's oath. After the defender had made his deposition on oath, his agent proposed to cross-examine him, and, in the hearing of the defender, stated what he expected to prove by the cross-examination. The Sheriff-substitute refused to allow the cross-examination. The defender, who was still in the witness-box, then volunteered to make a statement. The Sheriff-substitute refused to allow the defender to make this statement, and after hearing the parties' agents, gave decree against the defender.

In an appeal by the defender under sec. 31 of the Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, held that the refusal of the Sheriff-substitute to allow the defender to make a statement in supplement to his deposition on oath constituted a "deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments" such as had or might have "prevented substantial justice from being done" within the meaning of sec. 31 of the Act. Appeal therefore sustained and cause remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to rehear the defender in the reference to oath.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord M'Laren. LdStormonth-Darling.

ON 12th January 1904, Miss Isabella Paterson, Main Street, Clackmannan, took out a summons in the Small-Debt Court at Alloa, concluding for decree for £12, against William Cowie Donald, High Street, Clackmannan, executor-nominate and universal legatory of the late Miss Mary Cowie, North Back Street, Clackmannan, under her general disposition and settlement, dated 12th August 1898.

The ground of the alleged debt was stated in the claim produced with the summons as follows:—"1903, February 26th. The late Miss Cowie having on or about this date endorsed a deposit-receipt for £325, and delivered the same to the said William Cowie Donald, with instructions to cash it and pay to the said Isabella Paterson out of the contents thereof a legacy of £20, and the defender having failed to make payment of such legacy:—To amount thereof, £20; restricted to £12."

The claim having been referred to the oath of the defender, the Sheriff-substitute (Dean Leslie), on 27th January 1904, found the defender, as executor-nominate foresaid, liable to the pursuer in the sum of £12, with 4s. 11d. of expenses.

Paterson v. Cowie's Executor.

The defender appealed under the 31st section of the Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, to the High Court of Justiciary.*

The appellant stated;—At the first calling of the case on 20th January 1904 the defence stated was a general denial that the amount was due, in respect that the deceased Miss Cowie was, on account of her state of health, not responsible for her actions, or capable of making a valid bequest at the date alleged. The case was continued for proof to 27th January 1904, and on the motion of the respondent's agent the Sheriff-substitute appointed the appellant to lead in the proof. At the second calling of the case, on 27th January 1904, the appellant's agent objected to lead in the proof, and argued that the respondent, who was the pursuer in the case, should prove her case in the usual way. The Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection. The Sheriff-substitute then, "of his own motion, in which the respondent's agent concurred, referred the respondent's claim to the oath of the appellant. The appellant's agent objected to the competency of this proceeding, on the ground that the respondent's claim being in respect of an alleged nuncupative legacy, and the deceased having died testate, a reference to the appellant's oath was incompetent, but the Sheriff-substitute repelled this objection.

"The appellant having been put on oath, admitted, in reply to the respondent's agent, that the deceased Miss Mary Cowie had verbally instructed him to pay whatever balance should be over of the said deposit-receipt to the respondent, after settling the provisions of the deceased's will. The respondent's agent having put no further question to the appellant, and having stated that his case was closed, the appellant was about to add an explanation qualifying his statement, but the Sheriff-substitute refused to allow him to do so. The Sheriff-substitute also refused leave to the appellant's agent to cross-examine the appellant, and put no questions to the appellant himself, but at once pronounced decree against the appellant for £12, with 4s. 11d. of expenses.

"The explanation which the appellant desired to make was to the effect that the deceased had subsequently recalled the instruction which he admitted she had given him, the same having been extorted from her by the respondent against her will; that the deceased at the time of giving the said instruction was seventy-five years of age, and was not in a fit state of mind, as certified by her doctor, to give any valid instructions as to the disposal of her estate, and died four days thereafter; that under the deceased's will the appellant, as executor-nominate, was directed to pay the deceased's debts and funeral expenses, and certain legacies amounting to £300, and that after having given effect to these directions, and paying the expenses of executing the trust, there was no balance available of the said

"Provided always that such appeal shall be competent only when founded on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part of the Sheriff, or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done, or on incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the Sheriff. . . ."

deposit-receipt for £325. The appellant had the deceased's doctor in attendance at the Court, and he and the appellant were prepared to prove these facts; but the appellant was not allowed an opportunity either of stating them himself or of proving them by leading evidence, so the defence that the deceased was not responsible for her actions, as stated by the appellant at the first calling, was never before the Court as evidence, and without this it was not possible for the Sheriff-substitute to arrive at the full facts of the case."

The appellant maintained that he was entitled to relief by appeal under the 31st section of the Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, in respect that "the Sheriff-substitute acted oppressively (1) in referring the respondent's claim to the appellant's oath; (2) in refusing to allow the appellant to lead evidence to rebut the respondent's claim; (3) in refusing to allow the appellant to add any qualifying explanation of his admission on oath; and (4) in giving decree for the sum of £12 in respect of a nuncupative legacy; whereby substantial injustice was done to the appellant."

The appellant therefore prayed the Court "to sustain the appeal; to recall the judgment or decree complained of; to assoilzie the appellant from the conclusions of the said summons; or otherwise to order a rehearing."

The respondent lodged answers, in which she stated:—At the first calling of the case on 20th January 1904, "the defence stated was a general denial that the amount was due." At the second calling of the case on 27th January 1904, the agent for the respondent "maintained his right (1) to refer the whole claim to the appellant's oath inasmuch as it rested on the allegation that the appellant was trustee for payment to the respondent of the sum sued for, or (2) to prove by parole evidence a nuncupative legacy of £8, 6s. 8d. The Sheriff-substitute allowed the reference to the appellant's oath.

"The appellant having been put on oath, deponed that on or about the date libelled the deceased Miss Cowie handed to him a deposit-receipt for £325, directing him, after payment of funeral expenses and certain provisions in her settlement, amounting together to £305 or thereby, to pay the balance in said deposit-receipt to the respondent. Admitted that on the respondent's agent objecting to the appellant's agent being allowed to cross-examine the appellant, the Sheriff-substitute sustained the objection, and explained that thereafter the appellant's agent made no suggestion for questions to be put by or through the Sheriff-substitute. The proof was then closed and the agents heard.

"Thereafter, for the first time, the appellant suggested making an addition to his deposition, but the Sheriff-substitute held that the suggestion was not timeously made, and held further that the appellant's oath established the respondent's claim, and gave decree accordingly."

The respondent submitted that the appeal should be refused, in respect—"(1) That it is incompetent, in respect that it seeks to review the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute on questions of law and on the merits; (2) that the Sheriff-substitute did not act oppressively in any of the matters stated in the appeal; (3) that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right."

On 19th July 1904 the Court (the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD TRAYNER, and LORD MONCREIFF), after a hearing, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Remit to the Sheriff-substitute to report as to the facts averred by the appellant and disputed by the respondent in her answers."

The Sheriff-substitute reported as follows:—"Whether at the first calling of this case on 20th January 1904 more than a general denial was stated as the defence I am unable to recollect, but on 27th January the defence was that the deceased Miss Cowie was not responsible for her actions and incapable of making a valid bequest at the date alleged, besides a general denial." [The Sheriff-substitute then adverted to a point not now reported.] "The full amount recoverable under the claim . . . was at this time expressly referred to by both parties as £8, 6s. 8d. The respondent was thereupon allowed to refer the claim to the appellant's oath on the footing of his being the trustee of the deceased.

"The appellant having been put on oath deponed that on the date libelled the deceased Miss Cowie handed him a deposit-receipt for £325, that she did not indorse or put a date upon the deposit-receipt, that she told him to pay a sum to the respondent, that respondent was to get the balance of the whole after the provisions of her will had been carried out, that he was not told to go to the bank, that she did not say what the provisions of the will were, that no specific sum was mentioned, that the provisions in the will amount to £300, that the balance would be £25, but that did not allow for the expense of the executry. Permission to cross-examine was refused to the appellant's agent, who did not suggest any questions. During a discussion as to the competency of cross-examination, the appellant's agent made a statement of what he expected to prove by cross-examination. This was in the hearing of the appellant, who was still in the witness-box. The appellant on his own account then intervened and volunteered a statement. I declined to receive his statement. After hearing the procurators I found that the appellant's oath had established the respondent's claim, and granted decree. The respondent's agent mentioned the sum of £12. No objection was made by the appellant's agent, and I assented."

The parties were then further heard.

The undernoted authorities were cited.[1]

At advising,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The statutory grounds on which this Court can entertain an appeal from a decree in the Small-Debt Court are very limited, and certainly do not include any ordinary mistake in law. Some of the reasons for which we are asked to recall this decree by the Sheriff-substitute at Alloa are nothing more than alleged mistakes in law of an ordinary kind—but there is one ground which goes a good deal further, and which I think requires us to exercise the power of review conferred upon us by the Small-Debt Act of 1837, section 31.

With the Sheriff-substitute's proceedings at the first calling of the case on 20th January 1904, and again at the second calling a week later, we have nothing to do, down to the point at which, as we learn from the learned Judge's report, he allowed the respondent "to refer the claim to the appellant's oath on the footing of his being the trustee of the deceased." So far the proceedings were either regular, or if there was any irregularity it was not of a sort cognisable by us. But then it appears from the same report that after the Sheriff had, rightly enough, refused permission to the appellant's agent to cross-examine his client, and while the appellant was still in the witness-box, the appellant on his own account "intervened and volunteered a statement," and the Sheriff "declined to receive his statement." The Sheriff then heard the procurators, found that the appellant's oath had established the respondent's claim, and granted decree. About this the Sheriff adds—"Respondent's agent mentioned the sum of £12, no objection was made by appellant's agent, and I assented." He mentions that at an earlier stage of the proceedings both parties had referred to the amount recoverable under the amended claim as £8, 6s. 8d. It may be doubted whether the decree for what was alleged to be a nuncupative legacy ought to have been for more than £8, 6s. 8d. But if that were the only ground of appeal I should regard it as falling within the category of a mere ordinary mistake in law, and not therefore appealable.

It is otherwise, I think, with the Sheriff's refusal to hear the statement volunteered by the appellant on a reference to his oath. When the respondent referred her claim to her adversary's oath, and was allowed to do so, all other probation was excluded; the question then became non quid verum sed quid juratum est. It is of the essence of that mode of investigating the facts of a case that the fullest opportunity should be given to the deponent to tell his own story. Anything like judicial refusal to hear what the deponent has to say, even if it be not in answer to questions put by his adversary, but by way of explanation coming from himself, is or may be so fatal to the proper understanding of his deposition that it seems to me clearly to fall within the category of objections for which we are bound to give redress.

Having regard to the decisions on section 31 of the Act of 1837, we should be justified in holding this objection as constructive "oppression." But it is better, I think, to put it on the ground of a "deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments" which has "prevented substantial justice from having been done." No doubt the details of procedure under a reference to oath are not prescribed by statute; but the thing itself is recognised by the 13th section of the Small-Debt Act, which requires the Sheriff to put the parties or any of them upon oath "in case of a reference being made." And this, of course, involves that the procedure must be conducted according to law.

I am therefore of opinion that we should sustain the appeal, recall the decree complained of, and remit to the Sheriff to rehear the appellant in the reference to his oath, and to proceed in terms of law. It will then be for the Sheriff to decide whether the oath, as fully taken, is affirmative or negative of the reference.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the Sheriff-substitute should have received the statement tendered by the appellant in supplement of the deposition given by him under the reference to his oath: Sustain the appeal: Recall the decree appealed against, and remit to the Sheriff-substitute to rehear the appellant in the reference to his oath and to proceed in terms of law, and decern."

Proof—Witness—Commission to examine witness abroad—Act 1587, cap. 91.—The Court of Justiciary will not grant a commission to examine a witness abroad with a view to his deposition being read to the jury at the trial, such evidence being contrary to the Act 1587, cap. 91, and to the practice of the Court of Justiciary since its institution.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. Kyllachy. Lord Kincairney.

GRAEME HUNTER, 9 Kelvinside Gardens East, Glasgow, and Gavin Cowper, 51 Cecil Street, Hillhead, Glasgow, were indicted at the instance of His Majesty's Advocate, the charge against them being that, having obtained an agency from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company entitling them to sell on commission steamboat and railway tickets available over the said company's system, they induced certain persons specified to purchase from them their passages to certain places in Canada, and to pay the accused the sums specified, on the pretence that the accused had obtained employment for the said persons at the said places, the accused well knowing that they had not provided, and could not provide, employment for any of said persons at said places.

The trial was fixed to take place before the High Court of Justiciary at Glasgow on 27th December 1904, but that diet was deserted pro loco et tempore to allow the panels to bring evidence from Canada. A new indictment was thereafter served, and a diet for trial was fixed for 28th February 1905, at Glasgow.

On 18th February 1905 Hunter presented a petition to the High Court of Justiciary praying for a commission to examine witnesses in Canada.

The petitioner stated that the witnesses in question were to depone as to the state of the labour market in Canada at the time of the offences libelled.

Argued for the petitioner;—What the Act 1587, cap. 91,[1] struck at was the private communication of evidence to the Assize; it did not strike at evidence taken on commission, as was shewn by cases that had occurred in practice.[2] To construe an Act passed more than three centuries ago as absolutely excluding evidence taken on commission would be to ignore the altered conditions of the times. If the proposed evidence had related to the proper res gestæ of the alleged offence it might have been different, but here the demeanour of the witnesses was of no importance. A witness originally on the Crown list had been allowed to return to Canada. It was important for the petitioner that the evidence of this witness should be laid before the jury, and it was unreasonable to expect that the petitioner should be at the expense of bringing him to this country even if he was willing to come.

Argued for the Crown;—The petition should be refused. The Act 1587, cap. 91, was imperative in its terms, and if in early times there had been irregularities in the application of the Act, there had been none since the institution of the present Court of Justiciary.[1] Even if a relaxation of the Act was permissible in exceptional cases, this was not a case for such relaxation. A diet had already been deserted to allow witnesses to be brought from Canada, and the evidence which it was proposed to adduce was really irrelevant to this indictment.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The law of the land as regards the leading of evidence at criminal trials is fixed by the Act of 1587, c. 91, which declares "that in all tyme cuming, the haill accusatioun, ressoning, writtis, witnessis, and uthir probatioun and instructioun quhatsumever of the cryme, sall be allegit, resonit, and deducit to the assyze in presence of the partie accusit in face of judgment and na uthirwayes."

That law has regulated the practice up to the present day. As Hume expresses it, the witnesses "must be produced to tell their own story themselves, and say what they know concerning those matters of their own proper knowledge." The only exception (which is not truly an exception at all) is that where a person has died before the trial, what he said can be proved quantum valeat.

The petition now before us asks the Court to grant a commission to examine witnesses abroad with a view to their depositions being read to the jury at the trial. That, it appears to me, would be in direct breach of the statute and contrary to the practice since the establishment of the Court of Justiciary, and accordingly I am of opinion that the prayer must be refused.

I only desire to add this—that it is a different question whether in such a case as this the difficulties of the defence in bringing witnesses from a great distance may not be a legitimate matter for consideration of the jury in making up their minds upon the case.

LORD KYLLACHY and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT refused the petition.

The trial took place before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury at Glasgow on 28th February to 3d March 1905.

The Jury returned the following verdict:—"The Jury unanimously find the pannels not guilty," and the Court accordingly assoilzied them simpliciter, and dismissed them from the Bar.

ALEXANDER KESSACK, Appellant.—Dewar, K.C.—A. M. Anderson.
ROBERT MACAULAY SMITH (Burgh Prosecutor, Edinburgh), Respondent.—Younger, K.C.—Spens.

Public-house—Breach of Certificate—Licence-holder drunk on premises after hour of closing—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25) Sixth Schedule.—The form of certificate for public-houses set forth in the Sixth Schedule to the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, provides that the licence-holder shall be empowered to sell exciseable liquor on condition, inter alia, that "he do not himself be in a state of intoxication on the premises."

Held (by a Full Bench) that this condition applied at all hours, and not merely during the hours when the public-house was open to the public, and consequently that a publican who was found drunk in his public-house at 3 A.M. had committed a breach of his certificate.

Public-house—Breach of Certificate—Knowingly permitting drunkenness within licensed premises—Proof—Onus—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25), sec. 98.—The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 98, enacts,—"Where a licensed person is charged with permitting drunkenness on the premises, and it is proved that any person was drunk on his premises, it shall lie on the licensed person to prove that he and the persons employed by him took all reasonable steps for preventing drunkenness on the premises."

The holder of a public-house certificate was charged with knowingly permitting drunkenness within the licensed premises in breach of his certificate, by allowing R. S. to remain in the premises when in a state of intoxication.

It was proved that the accused and R. S., who were friends, were both found in the licensed premises at 3 A.M., asleep, and intoxicated.

Held (by a Full Bench, dub. Lord Kincairney), that the accused had failed to discharge the onus imposed on him by sec. 98 of the Act, and consequently that he had rightly been convicted of the breach of certificate charged.

July 12, 1905. Kessack v. Smith.

Kessack pleaded not guilty, and the case went to trial on 8th November.

On 14th November the Judge of Police, in respect of the evidence adduced, convicted Kessack of each of the two contraventions charged, and imposed the penalty of £2, 10s. with the alternative of five days' imprisonment, in respect of each contravention.

Kessack obtained a case for appeal. The case set forth that the following facts were proved:—

"1. That the appellant was the holder of a public-house certificate in the form prescribed by the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, for the premises referred to in the complaint, for the current year ending 15th May 1905 next.

"2. That on the date first libelled the appellant closed his premises for business at ten o'clock in the evening, being the hour fixed by the magistrates for the closing of public-houses in Edinburgh under the powers conferred on them by the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, and inserted as the closing hour in the appellant's certificate. At the time of closing there were present the appellant's two shopmen and two friends, the said Robert Smeaton and Donald Morrison, a soldier, on furlough from, and shortly to return to, Malta.

"3. That no contravention of the appellant's certificate was committed during the hours in which the appellant was entitled to keep mission of any excise licence to him in that behalf granted, on the terms and conditions following (that is to say): that the said A.L. do not fraudulently adulterate the bread or other victuals or liquors sold by him, or sell the same, knowing them to have been fraudulently adulterated; and do not sell any groceries or other uncooked provisions in the said house or premises, to be consumed elsewhere; and do not knowingly permit any breach of the peace, drunkenness, or riotous or disorderly conduct, within the said house or premises and do not himself be in a state of intoxication on the premises; and do not permit or suffer men or women of notoriously bad fame, or girls or boys, to assemble and meet therein; and do not sell or supply exciseable liquor to girls or boys apparently under fourteen years of age, or to persons who are in a state of intoxication, and do not receive or take in, as the price or for the supply of exciseable liquors, any wearing apparel, goods, or chattels; and do not permit or suffer any unlawful games therein; and do not keep open house, or permit or suffer any drinking in any part of the premises belonging thereto, or sell or give out therefrom any liquors, before eight of the clock in the morning of any day, or after such hour at night of any day not earlier than ten and not later than eleven as the Licensing Court may direct; and do not open his house for the sale of any liquors, or permit or suffer any drinking therein, or on the premises thereto belonging, or sell or give out the same, or any other goods or commodities, on Sunday; and, lastly, do not transgress or commit any breach of the conditions of any permission to sell on a public or special occasion within his own house or elsewhere; and do maintain good order and rule within his house and premises."

open his licensed premises on either of the dates specified in the complaint.

"That at about twenty minutes past ten o'clock of the evening referred to, the appellant's two shopmen left the premises, closing the door thereof behind them, leaving in the premises the appellant and his aforesaid two friends, the said Robert Smeaton and Donald Morrison. That they having all been members of the Royal Highlanders, and Morrison and the appellant comrades in that regiment, the appellant invited them to partake of his hospitality, and accordingly provided whisky and cigars. At this point neither the appellant nor his friends were in a state of intoxication. That Morrison left the appellant's premises shortly after 10.30 P.M., having been let out by the appellant, who duly closed the door after him.

"5. That about thirty minutes past twelve of the morning of the second date above libelled a police-constable observed that the electric light in the appellant's shop had not been switched off, but returning shortly afterwards found that the light had been turned off and the premises duly secured.

"6. That shortly before three o'clock of the second date libelled, sounds were heard proceeding from the aforesaid premises, and the attention of the other police-officers, examined as witnesses, was directed to that circumstance. The witness Macpherson, with a key which he had in his possession, without the knowledge or consent of the appellant, opened the door of the appellant's premises, when there were found therein the appellant and his friend, the said Robert Smeaton, both in a state of intoxication. The police officer in charge having made a note of the case, and the appellant having closed his premises, the appellant and his friend proceeded home.

"7. Any exciseable liquor consumed was given gratuitously by the appellant, and in no way associated with the business carried on in said premises, which, as hereinbefore stated, terminated at ten o'clock P.M. of the first date libelled."

The following question of law was, inter alia, stated:—"(2) Was the fact that in the circumstances set forth the appellant and his friend became intoxicated, and were found in the appellant's premises in that state, sufficient to justify the aforesaid convictions?"

The appeal was heard before a Full Bench.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant could not, on a sound construction of the Act of 1903 and his certificate, be convicted of a breach of certificate in respect of personal conduct out of business hours and having no relation to the conduct of his business. The Act of 1903, sec. 41, empowered a licensing Court to make bye-laws for, among other things, "Enforcing the non-residence of a certificate-holder upon licensed premises," and such bye-laws, being duly made and confirmed, were in effect conditions of certificates granted by the Licensing Court. The Edinburgh Licensing Court had not made such a bye-law. Consequently the appellant's public-house was after closing hours in the same position as if it was his private residence; he was entitled to put up a bed in the premises and to use it habitually, and he was also entitled to stay in the premises all night on a particular occasion, as in the present instance. He was further entitled to entertain his friends with lodging and liquor, and if he and his friends after business hours got drunk in the premises, he did not commit a breach of his certificate either in respect of his own drunkenness or that of his friends.[1] Lester v. Torrens[2] was a distinct authority for the proposition that a publican did not commit a breach of his certificate by getting drunk on the premises after business hours. No doubt there the premises were the proper residence of the publican and his family, but if the appellant was entitled to use his public-house—habitually or upon occasion—as his residence, then Lester v. Torrens[2] exactly applied. It was said that Lester v. Torrens[2] was overruled by The Queen v. Pelly.[3] That was a mistake. Lester v. Torrens[2] was approved and distinguished in The Queen v. Pelly,[3] which was the case of a customer getting drunk in the premises during business hours, and being allowed to remain in the premises after they were closed; and the ratio of the judgment was that if a breach of certificate was committed by allowing the customer to get drunk and to remain on the premises during business hours, it did not cease to be a breach of certificate by reason of the premises being closed. The Queen v. Pelly[3] therefore had no application to the present case, which did not relate to a customer. The Magistrate expressly found that no contravention of the appellant's certificate was committed during business hours; that neither the appellant nor his friend were in a state of intoxication even at 10.30 after closing, when Morrison, the other friend, left; and that any excisable liquor consumed was given by the appellant gratuitously and not in the way of business. In short, it was just the case of a man entertaining his friend in his own residence and both of them getting drunk there, which was not an offence of any sort against the Licensing Acts.

Argued for the respondent;—The questions here raised depended on the construction of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, and particularly the form of certificate scheduled to that Act. The certificate did not express any limitation as to the time within which the publican was not to be drunk himself, or knowingly to permit others to be drunk, on the premises; the prohibition in both respects was absolute as regarded time. The only limitations as regarded time in the certificate had reference to keeping open house, or permitting or suffering drinking, or selling or giving out liquor, i.e., the limitations had reference to the time within which the publican might carry on his business. Be it that he was entitled to take liquor himself, or to give it to a friend gratuitously, after the hour of closing, it was an absolute condition that he neither became drunk himself nor knowingly allowed his friend to become drunk. If the limitation to the hours when the premises might be open for business was held to be implied as regarded drunkenness, then the same limitation must equally be implied with reference to permitting or suffering "men or women of notoriously bad fame, or girls or boys, to assemble therein," which would consequently be legal, although obviously much more objectionable, if only done after closing time. Further, the form of certificate for inns and hotels was in this respect in identically the same language as the form of certificate for public-houses, and the appellant's construction if put on the certificate for inns and hotels would make that certificate almost a dead letter. The English decisions cited by the appellant depended on the construction of the English statutes. Lester v. Torrens,[1] in so far as it laid down that licensed premises when closed to the public ceased to be under the Licensing Acts and became the private house of the publican, had been over-ruled by The Queen v. Pelly.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This is an appeal at the instance of Alexander Kessack, bringing under review a conviction which was obtained against him for the contravention of one of the terms of his certificate, he being a public-house keeper, in respect, first, that on a certain day in October 1904, he was found in his public-house premises in Edinburgh in a state of intoxication; and, secondly, that he did knowingly permit drunkenness upon his said premises by allowing a friend of his, Robert Smeaton, who was then in a state of drunkenness, to remain within the said premises. The facts set forth are, that the premises were closed in the ordinary way on that occasion, but two old friends of the appellant, who had been members of the same regiment, came in, and after the premises were closed sat having refreshments together. These refreshments were admittedly given as matter of hospitality by the appellant, and were not in any way paid for. One of the friends left and the other remained, and at an early hour in the morning the police who passed and heard what are called certain noises, which I understand to have been the snoring of these two persons who had gone to sleep, entered the premises with a key which they had and found these two persons in a state of intoxication, and also it seems asleep. The question is, whether such conduct constitutes a breach of the conditions contained in the certificate. A number of authorities have been quoted to your Lordships for the appellant, but I do not think that anything that has been cited is really applicable to the case before us. Many of them are cases dealing with "allowing drinking" and "giving out liquor." These are different questions. Also there have been cases, English cases, quoted as illustrating the meaning of the term "found drunk" on licensed premises under statutory provisions applying to any individual other than the publican. But here the question is necessarily narrowed down to a breach of certificate, a breach of a particular condition of the certificate, which is in these terms—"[Provided that (the licence-holder) . . . do not knowingly permit any breach of the peace, drunkenness, or riotous or disorderly conduct within the said house or premises, and do not himself be in a state of intoxication upon the premises, and do not permit or suffer men or women of notoriously bad fame, or girls or boys, to assemble or meet therein, and do not sell or supply exciseable liquor to girls or boys apparently under fourteen years of age, or to persons who are in a state of intoxication,"—and then afterwards comes a clause as to keeping open house or permitting drinking between certain hours. It has been strenuously argued to your Lordships that all these provisions only apply when the premises are being used as licensed premises, and have no application to the hours after closing. I have not been able to come to that view of the statute. In the first place, it is noticeable that the clause I have quoted is precisely a replica of the clauses which deal with a hotel licence, and it is evident that if your Lordships were to hold the argument good in the case of a hotel licence it would render the conditions altogether nugatory. Secondly, the clause in question occurs within the fasciculus of the clauses which seem to me to be independent of any particular time, in contradistinction to the fasciculus of clauses dealing with giving out drink. Thirdly, I cannot disguise from myself the fact that this measure is intended to meet such a case as the present, when I compare the form of certificate under the Act of 1903 with the form of certificate under the Act of 1862, which it replaces, in which these words are not present. For these reasons I am of opinion that the conviction ought to be upheld, and that although it is a hard case for the appellant the conviction is right and cannot be disturbed. Upon the facts I should have had considerable doubts on the second branch of the conviction, namely, as to allowing the man Smeaton to get drunk, were it not for the 98th section of the Act of 1903, which is in these terms—"Where a licensed person is charged with permitting drunkenness on the premises, and it is proved that any person was drunk on his premises, it shall lie on the licensed person to prove that he and the persons employed by him took all reasonable steps for preventing drunkenness on the premises." That seems to me to shift the onus—an onus which in this case, so far as I have seen, has not been discharged. Accordingly I think the conviction must stand upon both its branches.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts which have to be dealt with in this case are very simple. The complainer holds a public-house certificate. On a certain night, after the premises were closed to the public at the hour fixed by the licensing authority, he entertained a friend within the premises, with the result that he and the friend both exceeded the bounds of moderation, and on the police entering the premises both were found to be intoxicated. In consequence a complaint was instituted in the Police Court charging him with two offences against the conditions of his licence —(1) that he himself was intoxicated on the premises for which he held the licence, and (2) that he knowingly permitted drunkenness within the premises.

In defence it is maintained that no contravention is relevantly charged, because the contravention alleged was not within the hours when the premises were open under the conditions of the licence, and it was urged that "licensed premises" means "licensed premises while open to the public for licensed purposes." In my opinion that contention is unsound as applied to this case. It is quite settled that it is not a breach of certificate to entertain a friend after closing hours, provided there is no sale or trafficking in drink. But I am unable to see how that can form any argument in support of the complainer's case. The licencee of a public-house obtains the licence upon the footing that he is authorised to do certain things in the premises, and is liable to prosecution if he does certain other things specified in the certificate. And he may commit such an offence after the hours when the premises have been closed to the public. It is only necessary to refer to one or two illustrations to shew that this is so. Had the complainer in this case after shutting up the house sold liquor to his friend, who remained with him in it, he would undoubtedly have committed a breach of his certificate. It would not be a case of shebeening—of selling without a licence; it would be selling contrary to the terms of his certificate; the offence would be breach of the certificate. Another thing which he is forbidden to do is to suffer any gaming to be carried on in the licensed premises. Could it be said that if he did this after closing hours, even although he supplied no liquor to those engaging in gaming, say playing roulette, that he would not be committing a breach of his certificate? It seems to me clear that it could not.

No. 17.

Kessack v. Smith.

Now, by the recent Act of 1903 it is made an offence for a holder of a licence to be intoxicated on the premises licensed. I can see no ground for holding that that prohibition applies only during the hours that the premises may be lawfully open for the sale of liquor. The Legislature might well consider that a person licensed to sell liquor, whether hotelkeeper or publican, should be liable to punishment if he became intoxicated on the premises. For the evils which might follow from a licensed person being in that condition on his premises might be serious. It cannot, I think, be successfully argued that no such thing could have been intended. That being so, the language of the statute seems to me to be quite clear and unambiguous, and that only two things are necessary to constitute the offence—first, that the person holding the licence was intoxicated, and second, that the place where he was so intoxicated was the house for which he held the licence. I am therefore unable to hold that any error in law was committed by the Magistrate in convicting the complainer if he was satisfied that these two facts had been established by the evidence, and that it was of no consequence to the legality of the conviction that the time at which the complainer was so intoxicated was a time at which the house could not be open for business under the conditions of the licence.

Upon the second count of the charge I have equally no doubt. If the Magistrate was satisfied that it was proved that the complainer allowed his friend to remain in the licensed house when he was in a state of intoxication, then he was entitled to pronounce against him the conviction which he did, that he had knowingly permitted drunkenness within the premises. It is to be noted that under section 98, if it be the fact that a person was intoxicated in the premises, it lies on the licence-holder to clear himself of the imputation of knowingly permitting such a person to remain in the premises.

I am of opinion that this appeal should be refused.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur. I think the judgment on the first charge is very much clearer than that on the second, on which I have some doubt, but not sufficient to induce me to dissent.

THE COURT answered the second question of law in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

Statutory Offence—Gaming—Hazard—Implement for practising game of hazard—Element of skill in Game—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 406.—In a prosecution under sec. 406 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, against a confectioner, for exhibiting in his shop a machine or implement for playing a game of hazard in order to induce persons to play thereat, it was proved that the machine was put in motion by placing a penny in a slot, that this enabled a spring to be worked which propelled a ball into the upper part of the machine, whence it descended past pins (which caused irregularity in its course) to the bottom of the machine, unless it was intercepted by a sliding cup manipulated by the player, who, if he succeeded in intercepting the ball, received a metal disc entitling him to twopenceworth of goods in the shop, and, if he failed, forfeited his penny. There was no part of the machine where the ball could descend that the manipulator could not reach with the sliding cup. It was found by the magistrate that, although a certain amount of success in working the machine could be acquired by practice, yet that to an ordinary member of the public having no special opportunity of acquiring skill at it, its working depended on chance.

Held that the machine or implement was an implement for playing a game of hazard within the meaning of the section.

Held also—in a case relating to another machine of the same type—that it was not sufficient to prevent a conviction under section 406 that the player, irrespective of success or failure, received an article of some value, but of less value than the sum paid for playing.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. Kyllachy. LdStormonth-Darling.

FIRST CASE. FORTE v. DEWAR.

DAVID DEWAR, Procurator-fiscal of the burgh of Dundee, presented a complaint under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, in the Police Court at Dundee, against Paul Forte, confectioner, Dundee, in which the prosecutor alleged that the accused on 29th October 1904 had been found in possession of, and had exhibited in his shop at 84 Dura Street, Dundee, in order to induce or entice persons to play at a game of hazard, a machine which was an implement for playing a game of hazard (described in the complaint), and did induce or entice certain persons named to play at said game, all contrary to section 406 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.*

The accused pleaded not guilty.

On 20th December 1904 the Magistrate found the accused guilty of the contravention charged, and fined him £5, with the alternative of one month's imprisonment.

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), enacts, sec. 406:—"All persons who shall be found in possession of or shall exhibit implements or articles for practising games of hazard, in order to induce or entice, or who shall induce or entice, any person to play at any game of hazard, or who, by any fraudulent act or device, shall cozen and cheat or attempt to cozen or cheat any person out of any money or property, on conviction shall be imprisoned for any term not exceeding sixty days . . ."

Forte v. Dewar.
Ogilvie v. Benigno.

Forte appealed upon a stated case.

In the case the Magistrate stated as follows:—"It was proved (1) that the accused occupies a shop at 84 Dura Street, Dundee, and carries on in said shop the business of a confectioner; (2) that on the date libelled, accused kept on the counter of said shop, exposed and available to customers, the machine mentioned in the complaint; (3) that this machine is put into action by any person inserting a penny in the slot, whereupon such person is enabled to work a lever attached to a spring, which propels a ball into the upper part of the machine, from which said ball descends past a number of pins (which cause irregularity in the course of the ball) to the bottom of said machine, unless the ball is intercepted by being caught in a cup attached to a moving slide situated between the top and bottom of said machine, and manipulated by the player, who receives out of the machine, in the event of a ball being so intercepted, a metal disc entitling him to buy in said shop articles of the value of 2d., and in the contrary event, forfeits his penny, which is retained in the machine; (4) that although a certain amount of success in working the machine could be acquired by practice, yet that to an ordinary member of the public having no special opportunity of acquiring skill at it, its working depended on chance; (5) that the interception of the ball thus depended on chance or hazard so as to constitute the game one of hazard; and (6) that on the date and at the place libelled, the appellant induced or enticed to play at said game of hazard" two persons "named and designed in the complaint, all in contravention of section 406 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.

"It was admitted that there was no part of the machine where the ball could descend that the manipulator could not reach with the sliding cup."

The question of law was:—"On the facts held by me as proved, was I right in holding that the said machine was an implement or article for playing a game of hazard; in finding the accused guilty of the contravention charged, and in convicting him as I did?"

SECOND CASE. OGILVIE v. BENIGNO.

JOHN OGILVIE, Burgh Prosecutor, Peebles, presented a complaint under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, in the Police Court at Peebles against Antonio Benigno, ice-cream vendor, Peebles, in which the prosecutor alleged that the accused on 28th December 1904 was found in possession of and did exhibit in his shop at 22 High Street, Peebles, in order to induce or entice a person or persons to play at a game of hazard, a machine or implement for playing a game of hazard (described in the complaint), and did induce or entice certain persons named to play at said game, all contrary to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 406.* It was stated in the complaint that the machine was worked by putting a penny in the slot, and that in the event of failure at the game the player forfeited his penny.

The accused pleaded not guilty.

On 5th January 1905 the Magistrates found the charge not proven, and discharged the accused.

The prosecutor appealed upon a stated case.

In the case the Magistrates described a machine and a game

* Quoted supra, p. 82.

No. 18.

Forte v. Dewar.

Ogilvie v. Benigno.

similar to the machine and game described in the previous case. The only differences were (1) that in this machine out of five spaces in which the ball could descend there were two where the ball could not be reached by the player with the sliding cup, his chance of catching it being limited to the case of the ball descending in one or other of the three middle spaces; and (2) that irrespective of success or failure at the game the player on putting a penny in the slot of the machine received out of it a cigarette of less value than one penny. It was found that Benigno exhibited the machine in his shop in order to induce persons to play at the game described, and did induce certain persons named to play at it.

The Magistrates stated the grounds of their decision as follows:—"The prosecutor charged in the complaint, and undertook to prove, the game to be one of hazard within the meaning of the statute, in respect that in the event of the player failing to catch the ball with the cup his penny was forfeited. The Court, while holding that the game played with the machine was one of chance, yet inasmuch as in every case the player, according to the evidence led, receives out of the machine a cigarette, although of less value than a penny, held that the penny was not forfeited, and that the charge as libelled was not proven."

The question of law was,—"Whether on the facts proved the Magistrates were right in holding the charge not proven?"

The two cases were heard together.

FORTE v. DEWAR.

Argued for the appellant;—This was not a game of "hazard." The expression "hazard" was not defined in the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. The Act 12 Geo. II. cap. 28, which was the only Act which defined the game of hazard, shewed that it was a game played with cards or dice. The expression "hazard" was at least ambiguous, and it must be interpreted in its narrowest sense. But even if "hazard" was to be read as meaning "chance," this was not a game of chance, but a game of skill. This followed from finding (4) in the stated case. There was an element of chance in nearly all games, especially when played for the first time. In this game if sufficient skill were exhibited it was always possible to win. In none of the cases where convictions had been obtained was there such a large element of skill as there was here. The games in these cases were practically pure games of chance.[1] If the presence of an element of chance was enough, then all games were struck at by the section. That was not the intention of the Legislature. What was really intended to be put down was swindling, cozening, and cheating. Something of that nature was essential to a conviction.[2] There was nothing of that kind here.

Argued for the respondent;—"Hazard" had two distinct meanings—(1) a technical sense, in which it meant a particular game played with dice; (2) a general sense, in which it was equivalent to "chance" or "venture." In the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 406, the word was used in its general sense. It might be conceded that in this game there was an element of skill, but not enough to take it out of the scope of the section. This was still in the main a game of chance. For the ordinary man who had not practised at it it was purely chance. The introduction of an element of skill into a machine originally designed for a game of pure chance was not sufficient to save it if a material element of chance remained, especially if sufficient skill to win often could only be acquired by considerable practice.[1] This was a mere attempt to evade the statute.

OGILVIE v. BENIGNO.

The appellant (the prosecutor) adopted the argument for the respondent in the previous case as regarded the question whether the game was a game of hazard, and maintained that the giving of a cigarette in any event made no difference, so long as a chance of more was offered as well.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—A game of skill was just a game which could be learned by practice at it, whereas a game of chance could not. This was a game of skill. They adopted the argument for the appellant Forte. Here the player got a cigarette for certain. The certainty of the cigarette balanced the chance of the ball falling where the cup could not reach it. There was no risking of money. The Magistrates found that there was no forfeiture of the penny in the event of failure, and forfeiture of a stake in the event of failure was of the essence of the charge.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If I thought the question under this statute was simply whether the game is one of skill at all or partly of skill and partly of chance, the decision would be very easy. But the intention of the Legislature was to put down the use of such machines as are to be used for playing games of hazard. The amount of hazard may be modified; nevertheless the games here have been found to be games of hazard, which, the Act says, it shall be punishable to entice people to play at. I think the Magistrates had materials on which they could so find. It is quite true that, in the first of the two cases at any rate, a certain amount of skill might be acquired by which the person using the machine might frequently be successful. But I am unable to say that in spite of this the Magistrate was not entitled to find that the game was one of hazard.

In the second case, viz., Ogilvie v. Benigno, the Magistrate has acquitted the accused on the ground that, while the game played with the machine was one of chance, the player in every case received something, and the penny which he put in the machine was not therefore forfeited. I think it is plain that the giving of a cigarette for the penny is a mere attempt to evade the statute. That the cigarette is given for the purpose of getting the machine used, no one can doubt, and that it is a game of hazard which is played I have no doubt whatever.

Ogilvie v. Benigno.

LORD KYLLACHY.—In these cases our only duty is to construe the statute. Endeavouring to do so, I am unable to hold—having regard to the findings in fact, by which we are bound—that in either of the two cases before us the games in question were substantially games of skill, or were other than substantially games of chance.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I think it is important to bear in mind that in neither of the cases before us was the accused charged with attempting to cozen or cheat anyone. There is provision for a charge of that kind in the section of the statute, but it is not under that part of the section that the complaints are brought. The only question is whether the machines which were found on the premises of the accused were for the purpose of practising games of hazard in order to induce or entice any person to play at such a game. Now, the finding of the Magistrate in Forte v. Dewar is, that to an ordinary member of the public having no special opportunity of acquiring skill at it, its working depended on chance, and he held that the machine was for practising a game of hazard. The Magistrate in the other case, Ogilvie v. Benigno, had an even stronger opinion to the same effect, and his reason was that owing to the construction of the machine there was no possibility of learning to win on every occasion by any amount of skill. It seems to me there is no reason for making the smallest distinction between the two machines. Both are for playing games of hazard. I think it most undesirable that we should attempt to lay down any rule as to what amount or admixture of skill is requisite to exclude the case from the operation of the statute. Both magistrates found a sufficient element of chance to bring the machines under the statutory description; and the mere fact that something was given back to the unsuccessful player does not detract from the character of the game.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutors:—

In Forte v. Dewar:—"Answer the question in the case in the affirmative: Dismiss the appeal, and decern."

In Ogilvie v. Benigno:—"Answer the question in the case in the negative: Find that the Magistrates ought to have convicted the respondent: Sustain the appeal, and decern."

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. Kyllachy.
Ld Stormonth-Darling.

ON 28th February 1905 Martin Olsen, 26 Hart Street, Grimsby, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Dornoch, on a summary complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Sutherlandshire, setting forth "that Martin Olsen, of 26 Hart Street, Grimsby, did, on 19th February 1905, in a part of the Dornoch Firth situated four and a quarter miles south quarter east (magnetic) from Brora Point, in the parish of Clyne and county of Sutherland, while acting as master or the person for the time being in command of the steam trawler 'Catalonia,' S.R. 9, of Stavanger, Norway, use the method of fishing known as otter-trawling in the foresaid part of the Dornoch Firth, which firth is part of the waters specified in the schedule annexed to the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, and bye-law No. 2, made by the Fishery Board for Scotland, under the powers conferred on said Board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1885, dated, said bye-law, at Edinburgh on 18th April 1887, and confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland on 27th June 1887, contrary to the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 6, whereby he has rendered himself liable, in terms of said Act, as amended by section 3 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890,* to a fine not exceeding £100,

* The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 23), enacts:—

Sec. 6. "(1) It shall not be lawful to use the method of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling within three miles of low-water mark of any part of the coast of Scotland, nor within the waters specified in the schedule hereto annexed, save only between such points on the coast or within such other defined areas as may from time to time be permitted by bye-laws of the Fishery Board for Scotland, and subject to any conditions or regulations made by those bye-laws. . . .

"(2) The Fishery Board may from time to time make, alter, and revoke bye-laws for the purposes of this section, but a bye-law shall not be of any validity until it is confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland."

Subsec. (3) was repealed by the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 10), sec. 3, and the following substituted:—"Any person who uses any method of fishing in contravention of the 6th section of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, or of any bye-law of the Fishery Board duly confirmed, shall be liable, on conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, and failing immediate payment of the fine, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, without prejudice to diligence by poinding or arrestment, if no imprisonment has followed on the conviction; and every net set or attempted to be set, in contravention of this section, shall be forfeited, and may be seized and destroyed or otherwise disposed of by any superintendent of the herring fishery or other officer employed in the execution of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts."

The schedule to the Act of 1889, under the heading "As specified in the existing bye-laws of the Fishery Board," sets forth, inter alia, the "Dornoch Firth."

Bye-law (No. 2) made by the Fishery Board for Scotland under the powers conferred on the Board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1885, dated 18th April 1887, and duly confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland, 27th June 1887, provided as follows:—

"I. This bye-law shall extend and apply to that part of the sea inside of a line drawn from the Ord of Caithness, along the coast at a distance of three miles to a point opposite Brora, thence to Tarbet Ness Lighthouse, thence along the coast at a distance of three miles to a point opposite Balintore, thence to a point a mile west of the mouth of the Findhorn river, and and failing immediate payment of the fine, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, and further, to forfeiture of every net set or attempted to be set by him at the time and place libelled in contravention of the Act and section last above mentioned."

The accused objected that he was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, and under reservation of that objection pleaded not guilty.

The Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie), after evidence had been led in support of the complaint, pronounced this judgment:—"Finds, as regards the contravention charged, that the accused is not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, and dismisses the complaint."

The Procurator-fiscal obtained a case for appeal, which set forth as follows:—

"The respondent stated, as a preliminary objection, that said steam trawler being registered in Norway, and Norway not being one of the Powers signatory to the International Convention relating to Fisheries, dated 6th May 1882,* he was not subject to the jurisdiction of Dor-

"II. Within the foresaid limits, no person, unless in the service of the Fishery Board for Scotland, shall at any time from the date when this bye-law comes into force use any beam trawl for taking sea fish; and the master or the person actually in command of any vessel acting in contravention of this bye-law shall, on conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding £100; and failing immediate payment of the fine, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, without prejudice to diligence by poinding or imprisonment, if no imprisonment has followed on the conviction, all in terms of the said Act.

"III. This bye-law shall come into force on Monday, the 4th of July next."

* The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), entitled "An Act to carry into effect an International Convention concerning Fisheries in the North Sea and to amend the laws relating to British Sea Fisheries," enacts:—

Sec. 2. "The Convention set out in the first schedule to this Act (referred to in this Act as the Convention) is hereby confirmed, and the Articles thereof shall be of the same force as if they were enacted in the body of this Act."

Sec. 7. "(1) A foreign sea-fishing boat shall not enter within the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands, except for purposes recognised by international law, or by any convention, treaty, or arrangement for the time being in force between Her Majesty and any foreign state, or for any lawful purpose.

"(2) If a foreign sea-fishing boat enters the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands,

"(a) The boat shall return outside of the said limits so soon as the purpose for which it entered has been answered;

"(b) No person on board the boat shall fish or attempt to fish while the boat remains within the said limits;

"(c) Such regulations as Her Majesty may from time to time prescribe by Order in Council shall be duly observed.

"(3) In the event of any contravention of this section on the part of any foreign sea-fishing boat, or of any person belonging thereto, the master or person for the time being in charge of such boat shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding in the case of the first offence, ten pounds, and in the case of the second or any subsequent offence, twenty pounds."

noch Sheriff Court, and, under reservation of said preliminary objection, pleaded not guilty.

"It was proved that said steam trawler was registered in Stavanger, Norway.

"It was further proved that the respondent did on 19th February 1905, in a part of the Dornoch Firth situated four and a quarter miles south quarter east (magnetic) from Brora Point, in the parish of Clyne and county of Sutherland, while acting as master or the person for the time being in command of the said steam trawler, use the method of fishing known as otter-trawling; and there was produced by one of the appellant's witnesses the accompanying official Admiralty chart, having laid down thereon a blue cross shewing the foresaid position of said steam trawler.

"It was proved that the Dornoch Firth is part of the waters specified in the schedule annexed to the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, and said bye-law No. 2, by the production by another of the appellant's witnesses of the accompanying copy of a 'Manual of Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Acts and Statutory Bye-laws in force at 31st December 1900,' containing said bye-law No. 2 at page 254.

"The Sheriff-substitute, giving effect to the respondent's preliminary objection, found, as regards the contravention charged, that said steam trawler being registered in Norway (and Norway not being signatory to said International Convention), and being outside the three-mile limit while engaged in trawling, the respondent was not subject to the jurisdiction of Dornoch Sheriff Court, and dismissed the complaint."

The question of law was:—"Whether, in view of the facts stated as proved, and having regard to the enactments in section 6 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, as amended by section 3 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890, the respondent was subject to the jurisdiction of Dornoch Sheriff Court?"

Argued for the appellant;—From the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, as expressed in the case, it was not clear whether he held that that portion of the seas surrounding the British Islands within which Her Majesty's subjects have, by international law, the exclusive right of fishing, and where such portion is defined by the terms of any convention, treaty, or arrangement for the time being in force between Her Majesty and any foreign state, includes, as regards the sea-fishing boats and officers and subjects of that state, the portion so defined."

The parties to the Convention confirmed by sec. 2 of the Act were Her Majesty; His Majesty the Emperor of Germany; His Majesty the King of the Belgians; His Majesty the King of Denmark; the President of the French Republic; and His Majesty the King of the Netherlands.

Article II. of the Convention was in the following terms:—

"The fishermen of each country shall enjoy the exclusive right of fishery within the distance of three miles from low-water mark along the whole extent of the coasts of their respective countries, as well as of the dependent islands and banks.

"As regards bays, the distance of three miles shall be measured from a straight line drawn across the bay, in the part nearest the entrance, at the first point where the width does not exceed ten miles.

"The present article shall not in any way prejudice the freedom of navigation and anchorage in territorial waters accorded to fishing boats, provided they conform to the special police regulations enacted by the Powers to whom the shore belongs."

no Court in Scotland had jurisdiction to try a Norwegian for an offence against sec. 6 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, or merely that the Sheriff Court at Dornoch had not such jurisdiction. The case did not raise any question of that sort. If the respondent was subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts, it was plain that the Sheriff Court at Dornoch had jurisdiction. Nor was it clear whether the Sheriff-substitute proceeded on the ground that it was ultra vires of the Legislature to subject Norwegians to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts since Norway was not a party to the International Convention scheduled to the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883; or on the ground that sec. 6 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, could not, upon its construction, be held to apply to Norwegians, Norway not being a party to the International Convention. If the former was the Sheriff-substitute's ground of judgment he was plainly wrong. It was a settled constitutional principle in this country that the Courts of law had no jurisdiction to determine that an Act of Parliament was ultra vires of the Legislature. The jurisdiction of the Courts was limited to construing the Act, and if the construction which the language of the Act required in the judgment of the Court caused, or was likely to cause, international complications, that was a matter for legislative action, for diplomacy, or, in the last resort for war, but not for the Court. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 687, and the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 110, sec. 60, were examples of statutes which conferred a wide extra-territorial jurisdiction on the Courts of this country. If, on the other hand, the Sheriff-substitute meant that sec. 6 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, while it might apply to foreigners belonging to a country which was a party to the International Convention, did not apply to foreigners like Norwegians, whose country was not a party to the Convention, then the Sheriff-substitute mistook the question at issue, which was as to the construction of sec. 6 of the Herring Fishery Act of 1889, and on that question the International Convention and the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883, to which the Convention was scheduled, had only an indirect bearing. Sec. 6 of the Act of 1889 was expressed in absolutely general terms as regarded the persons to whom it applied, and the question was—Did the section, notwithstanding the generality of its terms, apply only to British subjects, or was it to be construed according to its language taken literally, and therefore as applying also to foreigners? But if it applied to foreigners at all, it applied to all foreigners; there was nothing to suggest that on this question as to the construction of sec. 6 of the Act of 1889 a distinction was to be drawn between foreigners according as they did or did not belong to a country which was a party to the International Convention. If the British Legislature professed to legislate for the high seas—if, for example, sec. 6 of the Act of 1889 had been absolutely general in its terms, not only as to the persons to whom it was to apply, but also as regarded the area to which it was to apply—then it was conceded that the Legislature was presumably legislating for its own subjects only, and that foreigners were presumably excluded; but if the Act was confined to waters which were prima facie territorial waters, the presumption was the other way, and foreigners were presumably included. The question here was as to whether the latter presumption had been rebutted, for obviously sec. 6 of the Act of 1889 was not legislation for the high seas. In order to rebut this presumption, it was not sufficient to shew that the area which was declared to be the area of the enactment was not within, or wholly within, territorial waters according to the rules of international law; or, to take the present case, that the rule as regarded bays of Art. II. of the International Convention was an arbitrary rule agreed to by the parties to the Convention, and not a rule of international law; or that a line drawn in accordance with bye-law No. 2 of the Fishery Board would not comply with the rule of Art. II. of the Convention. If the words of the Act shewed that the Legislature had in view only what it regarded, or chose to regard, as territorial waters, the presumption in favour of the inclusion of foreigners applied. If foreign nations took a different view as to the character of the waters, that, as already pointed out, was not a matter for the Courts of this country. Plainly in the present instance the Legislature regarded bye-law No. 2 of the Fishery Board as an application of the rule of international law in regard to bays—the rule embodied in Article II. of the Convention. The question of law ought therefore to be answered in the affirmative.

July 13, 1905. Peters v. Olsen.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The Sheriff-substitute had no jurisdiction to try this complaint even if the locus was within the three-mile limit, because the respondent was a foreigner, and the offence took place on board a foreign vessel. Apart from international convention, there was no restriction of the right of foreign fishermen to fish even within the three-mile limit, not being intra fauces terræ.[1] In the case of the "Franconia"[2] it was held that the foreign master of a foreign vessel which had run down another vessel within the three-mile limit was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Criminal Courts of this country on account of the collision. In consequence of that decision the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 73), was passed to give the Courts of this country criminal jurisdiction over foreigners within the three-mile limit; but that Act had nothing to do with fishing offences like the present. But (2) if foreign trawlers had, by international law, no right to fish within the three-mile limit that did not affect the respondent in the present case, because the locus of the alleged offence was not within the three-mile limit. De facto the locus was not within the three-mile limit in this sense that it was more than three miles from any land. It might be that it was within the three-mile limit as defined with respect to bays by Art. II. of the International Convention, but Norway was not a party to that convention, and Norwegian subjects would be bound by the rule there laid down only if the rule was in accordance with international law, which it was not. It was an arbitrary rule which the signatories to the convention had seen fit to make for themselves. That this was the opinion of the Legislature was plain from sec. 7 of the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883 to which the International Convention was scheduled, taken along with the definition of "the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands" in sec. 28 of the same Act. If the Acts of 1883 and of 1889 were read together could it be said that the Legislature intended sec. 6 of the Act of 1889 to apply to foreigners? The International Convention might bring subjects of the signatory Powers within sec. 6 of the Act of 1889, but it plainly excluded the subjects of a Power which was not a signatory. This prosecution was simply an attempt to treat Norway as if it were a signatory.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case is whether the respondent was subject to the jurisdiction of the Dornoch Sheriff Court under a complaint that he had committed a breach of the Herring Fishery laws. Now, that question seems to me to come to depend very much on the interpretation to be put on bye-law 2 of the Fishery Board, which has the authority of an Act of Parliament—whether, taking such a line crossing the Dornoch Firth as is given in that part of the bye-law, the place was within or without the limit which was so statutorily fixed. The bye-law itself is not very well drawn. It is rather blundered, for I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that the intention of the bye-law was, that coming down the coast from the north at three miles from the shore, you were to stop at the point at which on that line you were exactly three miles from Brora, and that you were then to draw a line across to the other side of the Firth to where the line coming from the south three miles off from the coast was exactly three miles from Tarbet Ness. I think that was the intention, but the bye-law is not so expressed. The bye-law is expressed that it "shall extend and apply to that part of the sea inside of a line drawn from the Ord of Caithness, along the coast at a distance of three miles to a point opposite Brora, thence to Tarbet Ness Lighthouse, thence along the coast at a distance of three miles to a point opposite Balintore." So that the point at which the line was to run across from the direction of Tarbet Ness was a line drawn straight from Tarbet Ness to the point opposite Brora, as being the point which was three miles from Brora. Of course that will make a difference, because a line so drawn will be, on the south end, considerably further inwards of the Firth than a line drawn from a point which is reached exactly three miles from Tarbet Ness on the line three miles from the coast coming from the south. But I think we are relieved altogether from any difficulty in regard to that, because of course in a case of this kind one must look to the chart in order to make things intelligible, and I am perfectly satisfied on examination of the chart that were you to draw a line from a point three miles outside Brora to Tarbet Ness or to a point three miles outside Tarbet Ness—in both those cases the place where the blue cross is is within the line. That seems quite sufficient for the disposal of this case, and accordingly I think that the question in the case should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur. When the case is quite understood, it seems to me to be fairly simple. The position is this: The Legislature has by a certain statute made it an offence cognisable and punishable by the judicatories of this country to fish in a certain manner within certain waters specified in a certain bye-law of the Fishery Board for Scotland. There can be no doubt, for the reasons explained by your Lordship, that the defender, a foreigner, did fish in the prohibited manner within those waters. The question is whether the fact that he is a foreigner excludes him from the operation of the enactment.

It is not disputed that if the statute, upon its just construction, applies to foreigners, and does so without qualification express or implied, the Court of the Sheriffdom of Ross and Sutherland, and this Court by way of review, have full jurisdiction to try and to punish foreigners equally with British subjects for offences of the nature specified. To affirm the contrary would be to affirm that His Majesty's Judges, inferior or superior, are at liberty to canvass or question the authority of Acts of Parliament on the ground that they contain enactments to which other nations may take exception as contrary to international law.

No. 19.

July 13, 1905
Peters v. Olsen.

It was, however, contended by the respondent that the enactment in question did not upon its just construction apply to foreigners, at least as regards any part of the waters specified in the bye-law, which, upon the doctrines of international law, are outside territorial limits. And it was in that view submitted to us, as a proposition justifying the Sheriff-substitute's declinature to exercise jurisdiction as against the respondent, that the particular place where the offence here is said to have been committed was, although within the waters specified in the bye-law, yet, on the principles of international law, outside territorial waters.

I am quite unable to sustain this contention for two reasons, each of which is I think conclusive.

In the first place I cannot put upon the enactment the limited construction which is suggested. It appears to me that its language is quite general, and that it makes no exception, express or implied, such as the respondent suggests.

But in the next place I am equally unable to hold that there was, or is, here involved any question of extra-territorial waters. The place where the offence was committed was—as I understand the doctrines of international law applicable—well within territorial limits. In other words it was, in my opinion, well within the three-mile limit as generally interpreted, and particularly within the definition of that limit expressed (I think in entire consonance with international law) by article 2 of the International Convention of 1882. So soon as the chart put before us and referred to in the Sheriff-substitute's judgment was understood, it appeared to me, and I think did so to all your Lordships, that that was quite manifest.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—We are told in this case that the respondent did, on 19th February 1905, use the method of fishing called otter-trawling in a part of the Dornoch Firth, at a point marked by a blue cross on the accompanying Admiralty chart. It is said that this was not within three miles of low-water mark of any part of the coast of Scotland, but if it was within the waters specified in the schedule annexed to the Act, it was equally a contravention of the 6th section. Now, the schedule specifies the Dornoch Firth, and it refers to the existing bye-laws of the Fishery Board as defining the Dornoch Firth. When we turn to bye-law No. 2, issued by the Board and confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland in June 1887, we find a line drawn, which as your Lordship in the chair has explained, includes the point marked by the blue cross.

The method of fishing therefore used by the respondent on the day charged in the complaint constituted a contravention of the 6th section of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889. The section makes no distinction between British subjects and foreigners, or between British ships and foreign ships. It is not for a Court of law to make a distinction which Parliament has not seen fit to make. While the three-mile limit may be taken in ordinary circumstances as defining the territorial waters within which every State has the same jurisdiction and right of absolute regulation as it has over its own land territory, a modification of this rule has always been recognised to meet the case of land-locked estuaries, lochs, and bays. The Loch Long case[1] is conclusive as to land-locked waters. The seaward limit of a bay on the open coast may be more difficult to define, but where (as here) Parliament has assumed the responsibility of defining it, the Courts of this country are bound to carry out its behests, and for that purpose to exercise their jurisdiction. I therefore agree that the question of law should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I should have said that in my opinion I had no doubt on the question whether under the statute and regulation this place —for it falls within the line fixed by the bye-law—was a place as to which the Court was bound to hold that everybody must be deemed to be subject to the law regulating the fisheries, whether British subject or foreigner.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative, and sustained the appeal.

C pleaded guilty, and was conditionally released under the First Offenders Act. The prosecutor having brought a new complaint against A and B tendered C as a witness. Held that C's evidence was admissible.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Ld. Kyllachy. Ld Stormonth-Darling.

ON 21st March 1905 Thomas Dickson, butcher, Newton-Stewart; James Kelly, grandson of and residing with William Kelly, labourer, King Street, Newton-Stewart; and Thomas Priestly, postrunner, residing in Newton-Stewart, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Wigtown on a summary complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused had broken into coachbuilding premises in Newton-Stewart, and stolen therefrom six brass carriage cups and twelve brass nuts.

When the complaint was called in Court only Kelly appeared, Dickson and Priestly being then in jail. Kelly pleaded guilty, and was conditionally released under the First Offenders Act.

The deliverance was in the following terms:—"At Wigtown, the 21st day of March 1905. The Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the judicial confession of the said James Kelly, finds the said James Kelly guilty of the crime charged; and in respect of his being only seventeen years of age, and of the trivial nature of the offence, and he having engaged to appear and receive judgment when called upon at any time during six calendar months from this date, and in the meantime to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, directs him to be released."

Thereafter, in April 1905, another complaint containing the same charge was brought against Dickson and Priestly.

Dickson and Priestly both pleaded not guilty.

The Procurator-fiscal having called Kelly, proposed to tender him as a witness for the prosecution.

The agent for Priestly objected on the ground that Kelly had already been charged with and convicted of the offence, and had been sentenced under the First Offenders Act.

The Sheriff-substitute (Watson) sustained the objection.

Evidence having been led in support of the complaint and in exculpation, the Sheriff-substitute, in respect of the evidence adduced, found Dickson guilty, and sentenced him to be imprisoned for ten days; and assoilzied Priestly.

The Procurator-fiscal appealed against the decision assoilzieing Priestly.

The case for appeal set forth the foregoing facts.

The question of law stated by the Sheriff-substitute was:—"Whether, in the circumstances, I was right in holding that the evidence of the said James Kelly was not admissible?"

The appellant argued that the Sheriff-substitute was plainly wrong in rejecting the evidence of Kelly.[1]

The respondent argued;—The Sheriff-substitute was right. A person who had been conditionally released under the First Offenders Act was not in the same position as a person who had been convicted and sentenced, or as a person who had consented to give King's evidence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There can be no doubt that it is quite competent for a prosecutor to call as a witness anyone who was guilty of the crime along with the accused. There is a condition attached to this to the effect that he cannot afterwards prosecute such person for the crime. But here there is no case of that kind. This person whom the prosecutor sought to adduce as a witness had been already brought up, had pleaded guilty, and had been dealt with, although that took the form, not of imprisonment but of giving him the benefit of the First Offenders Act. But when another person was brought up, I cannot see what possible objection there could be to receiving the evidence of the person whose case had been disposed of, and why it should not have been held competent I am unable to understand.

If the Sheriff thought it required authority to decide the question, the inquiry should have been directed to see whether there was any authority against the competency of the evidence. There is no law in this country, either common law or statute, which places any restriction on the competency of anyone to give evidence except in certain well-defined cases. In the present case there is certainly no practice, and the tendency of recent statutes is all in the direction of removing the disabilities of witnesses, where such had been established either by statutory enactment or by practice.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I am of the same opinion. I should only like to add that it has never, so far as I know, been doubted that, when a man is accused of a crime with another, and that other has been tried and convicted, he may be adduced as a witness. I have seen that done not long ago, when he was put into the witness-box by the accused. If he is competent as a witness for the accused, he must be equally so as a witness for the Crown. I cannot see what possible objection there can be.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

Turnbull v. Inland Revenue.

STEWART ROBERTSON TURNBULL, Appellant.—T. B. Morison.
SOLICITOR FOR INLAND REVENUE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Dundas—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Income-Tax—Residence in United Kingdom—Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 39.—A British merchant carried on business in Madras, and usually resided there, but his wife, with the children, lived for a number of years in the United Kingdom, occupying latterly a house belonging to her and purchased with his and her money, and he resided with them for months at a time when he came to the United Kingdom, as he did nearly every year. In the year of assessment ending 5th April 1903 he was never in the United Kingdom. In a question as to his liability to be assessed for income-tax for that year, held that he was not a person "residing in the United Kingdom" within the meaning of the Income-Tax Act, 1853, and therefore not liable to assessment.

2D DIVISION. Court of Exchequer.

STEWART ROBERTSON TURNBULL, merchant, Madras, and of 2 Corrennie Gardens, Edinburgh, appealed to the Commissioners of Income-tax, against an assessment upon £720 for the year ending 5th April 1903 made upon him under Schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts in respect of profits received in the United Kingdom from his business in Madras. The ground of appeal was that he was not a person resident within the United Kingdom during the year of assessment within the meaning of section 2, Schedule D, of the Income-Tax Act, 1853.*

The Commissioners refused the appeal, and confirmed the assessment.

At the instance of the appellant they stated a case for appeal, in which they found that the following facts were admitted or proved:—"(a) The appellant is a subject of His Majesty. He has carried on business for forty years as a merchant in Madras, where, besides his business premises, he has a residence, in which he usually resides. His wife has for a number of years resided with their children in the United Kingdom, and the appellant has latterly visited them for a shorter or longer period nearly every year. (b) He did so for six months in the year ending 5th April 1901, and for eight months in the year ending 5th April 1902. (c) For a number of years prior to Whitsunday 1900 the appellant's wife rented furnished houses in this country, in which she and the children resided, but in that year she purchased a dwelling-house, known as No. 2 Corrennie Gardens, Edinburgh, the money being provided partly by the appellant and partly by his wife. The conveyance to the house was taken to the appellant's wife and her heirs and assignees. (d) The appellant and his wife were not in the United Kingdom at any time during the year of assessment, that is the year ending 5th April 1903, but during the whole of that year the children (except the eldest daughter), and the servants, in charge of a lady superintendent, who also lived in the house, occupied the house at No. 2 Corrennie Gardens, Edinburgh. (e) The amount received in the United Kingdom from the profits of the business in Madras for defraying the cost of his household expenses and the education of his children in this country was estimated to be £720, on an average of three years preceding the 5th April 1902."

Argued for the appellant;—This was a case where there was no residence in the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact the appellant had not been within the United Kingdom at all during the year of assessment. Even if other years were considered his occasional residence there would not, under the provisions of section 39 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842,* render him liable for duty. The mere fact that a man's wife and children resided in the United Kingdom could not make him resident there. Residence was a question of fact, and in fact the appellant was resident in Madras. The case of Lloyd[1] was distinguishable, because there the appellant had in fact resided in the United Kingdom during a great part of the year of assessment. In that case he had two residences, one in the United Kingdom, one in Italy. In the present case there was only one residence—in Madras.

Argued for the respondent;—The duty was payable because the appellant had a fixed residence here. The fact of a residence made a man liable to assessment, whether he was actually there or not.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the deliverance of the Commissioners here is wrong. We are dealing with a case in which during a whole year, the year of assessment, the person who was to be assessed as residing in this country was never in this country. The only case that has been quoted to us is a case in which the person was residing in this country for a certain time during the year, and that completely differentiates the circumstances from those in this case. This gentleman has a usual residence in Madras, where he carries on business, and he was in that usual residence for the whole of the year of the assessment. It seems to me in these circumstances that it is not according to the sound reading of the statute to hold that his usual residence during the whole of that year was in the United Kingdom.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. I think the sections of the statute quoted to us along with the admission in the statement by the Commissioners afford an answer to the question put to us. It is admitted that this gentleman has a residence and place of business in Madras where he usually resides. I take it, and it was conceded at the Bar, that when you talk of a man's usual residence you talk of his "ordinary residence." If that is so, then section 39 of the Act of 1842 covers the case, "Any subject of Her Majesty whose ordinary residence shall have been in Great Britain" shall be liable; but this gentleman had not his ordinary residence in Great Britain, for ex confesso his ordinary residence was in Madras. Section 2 of the Act of 1853, which is the charging section, says duties shall be payable "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom." The test of liability is not having a residence in the United Kingdom, it is residing in the United Kingdom. I think that to suggest that this gentleman was residing in the United Kingdom is contrary to the plain meaning of the admission to which I have already referred, and is contrary to the fact, for during the whole year of assessment he was residing in Madras, and not in Great Britain at all. I therefore think with your Lordships that the Commissioners were wrong.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. During the year of assessment ending 5th April 1903, this gentleman was not residing in this country at all. I do not think that that fact taken by itself would be by any means conclusive, because if he had been travelling, or had been a mariner and had been absent the whole of the year, I do not think that would have prevented him from having a residence in this country. But, then, in addition to that, we find that his business is in Madras, and that I take to be his usual place of residence. It is quite true that between the years 1899 and 1901 he occasionally visited this country for longer or shorter periods. That was for the purpose of seeing his wife and children, who, I presume, resided here because they were unable to stand the climate of India. Looking to the whole of the facts taken together, I think the fair inference is that his residence in the sense of the statute was not in this country.

THE COURT reversed the determination of the Commissioners.

Expenses—Jury Trial—Modification.—In an action raised in the Court of Session by an inspector of police against a railway company for £500 of damages for assault, the jury awarded £10 of damages. The defenders had made no tender.

The defenders moved that expenses to the pursuer should be subject to modification, in respect that the case should have been tried in the Sheriff Court.

The Court refused the motion.

1ST DIVISION. ALEXANDER M'GILP, inspector of police, Greenock, raised an action in the Court of Session against the Caledonian Railway Company in which he claimed £500 as damages for assault committed upon him by three servants of the Company, acting within the scope of their employment.

The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury.

The jury awarded the pursuer £10 of damages. The defenders had made no tender.

The pursuer having moved the Court to apply the verdict and find him entitled to expenses, the defenders moved that expenses to the pursuer should be modified, and argued;—The case should have been raised and tried in the Sheriff Court. The Court would modify expenses when the trifling sum awarded shewed that the case should have been tried in the Sheriff Court.[1] [LORD KINNEAR.—Is there any case in which expenses have been modified, under circumstances similar to the present, in an action raised in the Court of Session?] It was true that the cases quoted had originated in the Sheriff Court, but here the argument in favour of modification was even stronger because of the increased expense unnecessarily incurred in the initial stages of the action.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I see no ground for modification in this case.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT refused the defenders' motion, and applied the verdict, with expenses to the pursuer.

Bryce v. Ehrmann.

THOMAS LENNOX BRYCE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Salvesen, K.C.—Macmillan.
BENZION EHRMANN, Claimant (Respondent).—Mackenzie, K.C.—M'Clure.

Sale—Right in Security—Sale on Approbation—Goods pawned by retail dealer—Title of pawnbroker—Loss arising by fraud on two innocent parties—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 18, Rule 4 (a).—Ehrmann, a wholesale jeweller, was in the habit of sending goods to Anderson, a retail jeweller, with the wholesale prices marked, with power to sell and deliver on his own account and for his own profit any articles he might sell, Anderson being liable only for the wholesale price. At the same time Ehrmann sent a printed notice headed "approbation note," stating that the goods were to remain the property of the sender till invoiced by him to Anderson. Anderson having retained a diamond necklace for several months, Ehrmann in April 1903 urged Anderson to purchase the necklace himself, and offered to take bills for the price. Anderson agreed to do so, and the necklace was invoiced to him, and the bills were granted by him.

Anderson having subsequently become bankrupt, Bryce, a pawnbroker, with whom Anderson had in December 1902, without Ehrmann's knowledge, pledged the necklace, raised an action of multiplepoinding to determine the right thereto.

Claims were lodged by Ehrmann, by Bryce, and by Anderson's trustee, but the claim by the last was not insisted in.

Held (1) that as in December 1902 Anderson had been put by Ehrmann in a position to give a good title to a purchaser, he could validly pledge the necklace, and had validly pledged it to Bryce; (2) that as Anderson's trustee did not insist in his claim Ehrmann was entitled to delivery of the necklace after satisfying Bryce's claim.

Brown v. Marr, Barclay, &c., 7 R. 427, approved.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN August 1903 an action of multiplepoinding was raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow by T. L. Bryce, pawnbroker, Glasgow, for the purpose of determining the right to a diamond necklace which had been pledged with him on 18th December 1902 by Robert Anderson, jeweller, 13 South Exchange Street.

The circumstances in which the action was raised were stated in a joint minute of admissions by the three claimants after-mentioned. "(1) The claimant, Benzion Ehrmann, is a wholesale jeweller in London, and he was in the habit of sending articles of jewellery on sale or approbation to Robert Anderson, manufacturing jeweller, Glasgow. The terms on which the goods were so sent were that Robert Anderson was to endeavour to effect a sale of the same, and in the event of his doing so he was to be entitled to purchase them from Ehrmann at a price specified by the latter in an approbation note which accompanied each parcel of goods. It was further agreed that all such goods should remain the property of Ehrmann until invoiced by him to Anderson, and that until so invoiced such goods were to be returned to Ehrmann on demand. Each approbation note bore a printed memorandum to the effect that the foregoing were the terms on which the goods were supplied. (2) The claimant, Thomas L. Bryce, is a licensed pawnbroker and money-lender, and carries on business at 67 Oswald Street, Glasgow. A common and recognised branch of business among pawnbrokers and money-lenders consists in the occasional assistance of watchmakers and jewellers in the conduct of their business by the advance of money upon the pledge or pawn of goods to the extent of adequate security. For some years past Anderson has dealt with Bryce."

It was further stated that on 13th December 1902 Ehrmann sent to Anderson the necklace in question "on approbation on the terms before set forth." "(5) On 18th December 1902 Anderson, without the knowledge or consent of Ehrmann, pledged the necklace with Bryce against a loan. (6) Between 16th December 1902 and 24th April 1903 a correspondence took place between Anderson or his firm of Robert Anderson & Co. and Ehrmann. During the whole of the period covered by said correspondence the necklace was pledged with Bryce as aforesaid, but Anderson concealed this fact from Ehrmann, and led him to believe by his letter that he still had it and was endeavouring to sell it to a customer."

The correspondence produced included the following letters :—

Ehrmann to Anderson.

"London, E.C., April 21st, 1903.

"With reference to the two dd. necklaces, £64 and £110 [the one in question], and two pendants, £31 and £30=£235 in all, which has been so long in abeyance, I have to make the following proposal to you :—

"If you will accept invoice for these goods, I am prepared to draw for the amount at 3, 4, 5, or 6 months. This will enable you to take your own chance with your customer.

"As far as I am concerned, I will on no account leave the matter longer in abeyance.

"If you cannot get your customer to decide forthwith, or are not willing to agree to the above terms, I must ask you to return my goods without further delay."

Anderson to Ehrmann.

"Glasgow, 22nd April 1903.

"Dear Sir,—Send the bills, and I will accept them. . . ."

"(7) On or about 23d April 1903 Ehrmann invoiced the said necklace to Anderson as his absolute property along with certain other goods which had been sent to him on approbation by Ehrmann in the same manner. Bills of exchange were accepted by Ehrmann from Anderson in payment of the price of said goods, but the said bills have since been dishonoured and are still unpaid. (8) Anderson's estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts on or about 9th July 1903, and the defender, William Brodie Galbraith, was thereafter elected and confirmed trustee thereon."

The printed approbation note bore :—"On approbation from B. Ehrmann, diamond merchant, wholesale and manufacturing jeweller.

"The goods specified below remain my property until invoiced by me, you in the meantime being responsible for loss or damage. All uninvoiced goods to be returned on demand."

Claims were lodged for Bryce, for Ehrmann, and for Anderson's trustee in bankruptcy.

Bryce claimed to be entitled to retain the necklace till his claim was paid.

Ehrmann made the following alternative claims:—"To be ranked and preferred to the subject in medio as his absolute property; or, alternatively, to be ranked and preferred to the subject in medio as his property, subject to his repaying the amount advanced on the security of the same by the pursuer, with interest thereon to date of payment, in exchange for an assignation by the pursuer in favour of the claimant of his (pursuer's) claims against the said William Brodie Galbraith and Robert Anderson."

He pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The subject in medio not having been the property of the said Robert Anderson when he pledged the same with the pursuer, the said pledge was invalid, and the pursuer acquired no rights thereby. (2) This defender, having been induced to invoice the said necklace to the said Robert Anderson through material misrepresentations on his part, is entitled to repudiate the pretended sale.

For the purposes of this report it is unnecessary to specify the claim for Anderson's trustee, as he did not ultimately insist on it.

On 19th February 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) pronounced an interlocutor, by which he repelled the claim for Anderson's trustee, and sustained the alternative claim for Ehrmann.

On an appeal by Anderson's trustee, the Sheriff (Guthrie), on 13th June 1904, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on 13th December 1902 the claimant Ehrmann, a wholesale jeweller in London, sent to Robert Anderson, jeweller, Glasgow, a diamond necklace, the subject in medio, on the terms specified in an 'approbation note,' viz. —That Anderson was to endeavour to effect a sale of the same, and, in the event of his doing so, he was to be entitled to purchase it from Ehrmann at a specified price; that the necklace should remain Ehrmann's property till invoiced by him to Anderson; and that, till so invoiced, it should be returned to Ehrmann on demand: Finds that on 18th December Anderson pledged the necklace and other articles as he had done when it was previously in his possession on the same terms—for a loan—to the claimant Bryce; and that without the knowledge or consent of Ehrmann: Finds that after much correspondence, in which Ehrmann asked for the return of the necklace, and Anderson, falsely alleging that he was about to effect a sale of it, delayed to comply with Ehrmann's demands, an arrangement was made whereby the necklace was invoiced (along with other goods) to Anderson on 23d April 1903, Anderson granting bills for the price: Finds that these bills were dishonoured, and that Anderson became bankrupt, the claimant, Galbraith, being the trustee on his sequestrated estate: Finds that the said transaction on 23d April was entered into by Ehrmann in ignorance occasioned by Anderson's fraudulent concealment of the fact that he had fraudulently pledged the necklace to Bryce: Finds that Ehrmann is entitled to have the said transaction set aside, and to have it found, as it is hereby found, that the property in the necklace did not pass to Anderson: Finds that Anderson, having no property in the necklace, did not validly pledge it to the claimant Bryce: Therefore recalls the interlocutor of 19th February last; repels the claims of the party Galbraith, Anderson's trustee, and of the party Bryce, and prefers the claimant Ehrmann, to the subject in medio."*

Bryce appealed to the Court of Session. At the hearing of the appeal no appearance was made for Anderson's trustee in bankruptcy.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) On a fair construction of the correspondence between Ehrmann and Anderson, and the admissions in the case, the property in the necklace had passed to Anderson by being invoiced to him, and therefore, even if there were any defect in the original title of the pawnbroker, it was cured by accretion. That invoice stood, and must have effect until it was reduced. Further, there was no ground for reduction, because, although no doubt Anderson had made false statements to the effect that he was negotiating with a purchaser, these statements were not the inducing cause of the invoice. What Ehrmann desired was to make Anderson liable for the price of the necklace. (2) Assuming that the necklace had never been invoiced by Ehrmann to Anderson, still the pawnbroker was entitled to the advance he had made on it. For this Brown v. Marr, Barclay, &c.[1] was a direct authority. The principle there laid down was that when one of two innocent parties must suffer for the fraud of a third, the one whose conduct made this fraud possible must bear the loss. The authority of Brown v. Marr, Barclay, &c.,[1] was not in any degree weakened by Macdonald v. Westren,[2] or Mitchell v. Heys & Son.[3] Macdonald v. Westren[2] was a question between the wholesale dealer and the retail dealer's trustee in bankruptcy, where no question of apparent authority to dispose of the subject was involved. The circumstances of Mitchell v. Heys[3] were also entirely different. That was a case of rollers hired out for use, not the case where a person placed another in a position to dispose of goods, and with apparent authority to dispose of them. In such cases the true owner was barred from disputing the right of the pledgee.[4] In Helby v. Matthews,[5] the circumstances were different, and did not involve any apparent authority to dispose of the article. (3) The contract, fairly construed, and read in the light of the correspondence, conferred on Anderson a right to sell the goods. If he had done so, Ehrmann could not have disputed the purchaser's right. At common law, a right to sell involved the minor right to pledge,[6] or, if the case was to be considered under the provisions of section 18, rule 4 (a), of the Sale of Goods Act,* Anderson, by pledging the necklace, had done "an act adopting the transaction" within the meaning of the subsection.[7]

Argued for the respondent;—Admitting the authority of Brown v. Marr, Barclay, &c.,[1] it was not applicable to the present case. It was a case of an ordinary contract of sale and return, whereas here there was a contract of an exceptional character, under which the retail dealer had no authority even to sell, far less to pledge, the necklace, until it was invoiced to him by the wholesale dealer. If Anderson had sold the necklace, Ehrmann would still have been entitled to refuse to part with it. He clearly could and would have refused to invoice it had he known it was pledged. The pawnbroker therefore took no title, as his author had only a conditional right to dispose of the article, and the condition was not purified.[1] (2) The doctrine of holding out did not apply to the present case. That doctrine might apply in the case of documents of title, but had no application to a corporeal moveable, except in a case of personal bar, as, for instance, if Ehrmann had expressly led Bryce to believe that Anderson had authority to dispose of the necklace.[2] Brown v. Marr, Barclay, &c.,[3] as explained by Lord Kinnear in Mitchell v. Heys & Son[4] was not an authority to the contrary. (3) The fact that the goods were ultimately invoiced to Anderson was the result of Anderson's fraud. The mere concealment of the fact that he had pledged the goods was fraud.[5] In such a case the pledgee could not take advantage of the pledger's fraud.[6]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the question to be decided is between Ehrmann, who supplied the necklace in question to Anderson, the bankrupt, and Bryce, the pawnbroker with whom Anderson had pawned the goods a considerable time before his bankruptcy. Anderson's trustee does not now appear, and therefore the question is narrowed down to this—Is Ehrmann entitled to a decerniture to deliver the goods to him unconditionally, or is he only entitled to the goods on the terms on which the pawnbroker is willing to deliver them up, viz., on being recouped the amount which he advanced on them?

The contract in this case is peculiar, as Ehrmann in sending his goods to Anderson stipulates that the goods were to remain his property until invoiced by him, his purpose evidently being to keep up his right to them while they were in Anderson's hands or fell into the hands of his creditors. But it is clear from the documents in process that the purpose of the arrangement was that Anderson should as a retail dealer endeavour to effect a sale of the goods. He had the goods for that distinctly understood purpose. If Anderson could find a purchaser then Ehrmann was bound to let him have the goods at the arranged price of £110. The whole of the correspondence bears this out. Ehrmann's constant complaint is that Anderson does nothing to bring matters to a point with his customer, and he calls upon Anderson to "get your customer to make his decision one way or another." It is quite true that Anderson's side of the correspondence was deceitful, as he was not dealing with a customer, but had put the goods in pawn. But the point is that Ehrmann was in the belief that Anderson was negotiating a sale, as that was the purpose for which the goods were in his hands.

Bryce v. Ehrmann.

The case seems to me to be practically on all fours with that of Brown v. Marr.[1] Anderson had by his possession a right to sell on his own account and for his own profit. Although Ehrmann put in his written conditions as between him and Anderson a special stipulation, the act which he did in handing over the goods to Anderson that he might sell them for his own profit, placed Anderson in the position to do what he did—to do an act by which loss had been caused—and the loss must fall not upon the innocent party who dealt with Anderson, but upon the party whose actions enabled Anderson to do so. The Sheriff thinks that Brown v. Marr[1] is no longer an authority, and refers to the case of Macdonald v. Westren[2] as detracting from it. I do not so read the decision in that case. That was a case in which goods held by a person on sale or return were in his possession at the date of his bankruptcy, and it was held that they could not be claimed by his trustee as against the consignor, the bankrupt never having dealt with the goods as his own, as he had not effected any sale to a third party, or done any other act by which it could be held that he became the purchaser, liable for the price. That is a different case from Brown v. Marr,[1] and the Lord Justice-Clerk gives an exposition in it of the grounds on which Brown v. Marr[1] was decided, which are instructive in reference to the present case. He says:—"I desire to say with reference to the case of Brown v. Marr[1] that that decision did not turn on any question of property, but on the necessary inferences arising from the possession of the goods. There the retail dealer had possession, and he pawned the goods, and we held that as it was through the act of the wholesale merchant in putting him in possession of the goods and allowing him to deal with them as his own that he was enabled to deceive the pawnbroker, the wholesale merchant and not the pawnbroker ought to stand the risk of loss." And he added that that did not conflict with what had been said by Lord Young in giving the leading judgment.

Another case referred to by the Sheriff is the case of Mitchell v. Heys & Son,[3] but I am unable to see that there is any analogy between that case and the present one.

In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to consider the effects of the invoicing of the goods to Anderson, which took place after the pawning, although had it been necessary I should have held that the invoicing to Anderson and the granting of the bills made the contention of Ehrmann untenable. My opinion is in accordance with that expressed by Lord Moncreiff in the case of Brown v. Marr,[1] which I see no ground for holding has been superseded by the subsequent decision.

I am therefore in favour of recalling the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and of finding that Ehrmann can only receive delivery of the goods in question, which Bryce is willing to deliver up, on the condition which Bryce annexes, that the amount of his advance be made good to him.

LORD YOUNG.—I am substantially of the same opinion. The case is an interesting one, but it did not appear to me at first to be a very difficult one, although it has always been with reluctance that I have differed from the judgment of Mr Sheriff Guthrie. I have a very high opinion of his good sense and legal knowledge, and it is only upon careful consideration that I have agreed to reverse a judgment of his. But I have given the present case that careful consideration and reconsideration, and with the result, as I have stated, that I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the judgment ought to be recalled, and another pronounced. I do not think that I can usefully add anything to the observations which were made by me indicative of my opinion, or rather I should say impression, in the course of the argument, but I shall add a few words explanatory, referring to the joint minute of admissions, Article 7, which states,—"On or about 23d April 1903, Ehrmann invoiced the said necklace to Anderson as his absolute property, along with certain other goods which had been sent to him on approbation by Ehrmann in the same manner." That is an admission that the necklace, the fund in medio here, was, like the other goods referred to in this article, sent on approbation by Ehrmann. "Bills of exchange were accepted by Ehrmann from Anderson in payment of the price of the said goods, but the said bills have since been dishonoured, and are still unpaid." On that admission it is impossible to doubt that the necklace, which was then in possession of Anderson, was invoiced and declared to be his absolute property, and that bills of exchange were received in payment of the price. There might be grounds upon which this might be set aside. The Sheriff is of opinion that there is a ground for setting it aside or disregarding it in this, that Anderson had previous to 23d April pledged the necklace to Bryce, the pawnbroker, and that he did not disclose that. I cannot agree with the view that this would be any ground for disregarding the legal effect of the facts which are here admitted. It is not doubtful that by this invoice, and by the bills sent in return, Anderson was placed in the position of being able not merely to sell the goods as his own property, but also to pledge them. He was absolutely entitled to pledge the goods which had been invoiced to him, and for which his bills had been taken as payment of the price. And to say that the pledging of the goods subsequent to the invoicing and the declaration that they were his property would be good, and that the pledging before that was invalid to the pledgee—that is, the pawnbroker Bryce—is a proposition which I cannot sustain. I think Ehrmann, who sent the necklace to Anderson, could not maintain that these goods remained his property, and that Anderson was not at liberty to pledge them, upon the ground that he had pledged them already. But irrespective of this, which is conclusive, I may indicate my opinion upon the point that was argued, namely, upon Anderson's position to give a good title of pledge to a pawnbroker upon the contract between him and Ehrmann, irrespective of the invoicing of the necklace. It is not doubtful that a necklace was sent to him as a retail jeweller in order that he might sell it in the course of his trade, he selecting the purchaser, and when he sold the necklace, to any purchaser of his own selection at any price, being only personally liable to Ehrmann for the price stipulated. But the contention was that he could give a title of property to anybody to whom he sold the necklace as his own without any responsibility whatever to Ehrmann, but he could not give a title to a pawnbroker. That is a proposition which I cannot assent to, even considering the stipulation your Lordship referred to, that the goods were to remain the property of Ehrmann until they were invoiced. I think that means only so long as they were in the possession of Anderson and he had not disposed of them by way of sale to a third party. Neither the purchaser from him, nor the pawnbroker receiving them as a pledge, was bound to investigate into the title by which he held these goods. The purchaser certainly was not bound, and what ground had the pawnbroker for inquiring into the title by which he had them? So that Ehrmann, according to the view I take of the case upon the facts, which are substantially not in dispute, was in this position, that he had put Anderson in the position of keeping the goods at the price stipulated, or if not, of sending them back. Well, Anderson pledged the goods. It was indicated in the argument that that was thought to be inconsistent with a possible transaction with a purchaser to buy them, and to buy, presumably, at a price which would afford a profit to Anderson. I cannot see any inconsistency in that at all. Any jeweller pawning goods is quite at liberty to transact with an intending purchaser of these goods, and if he can agree to terms he may even tell the party with whom he is transacting "they are in pledge at this moment, but if we can agree upon the price, I will get them out of the pledge and hand them over to you." He need not even say anything about the pledge. He may say,—"I will send the goods, or I can get them to shew you, and if you buy them they will be handed to you, if not, send them back." How is the pawnbroker affected? Anderson found it convenient in the course of his business, while expecting to sell the necklace, and to sell it at a profit, to raise £100 by pledging it. What has the pledgee to do with that, except that he is entitled to keep it until the advance has been paid to him, and give it up only on that footing? I think on pledging the goods Anderson became the purchaser himself, and he was entitled to make himself the absolute purchaser, and to make himself absolutely liable upon a contract of sale with Ehrmann to pay the price therein specified, and I think he did so, and would have been dealt with as having done so, had he not become bankrupt, for that bankruptcy alone put him out of the position of being able, or having any interest, to make such a condition, or Ehrmann any interest to make a similar condition on his side. By pledging the goods on the footing that he was the owner—for it is only the owner that can pledge goods—Anderson himself became the purchaser, and he put himself in that position in a question with Ehrmann just as completely and effectually as if he had placed a third party, one of his own customers, in that position. That being so, the only question is whether there is any ground upon which the necklace can be taken from the pledgee without giving him the amount which he had advanced upon it? A question might have arisen if the necklace had been of such value as to make it of any interest to the creditors of Anderson, whose interests are maintained or maintainable by the trustee in bankruptcy. It might have been an interesting question worthy of being argued whether Anderson or his creditors, upon his bankruptcy, were not entitled to get the goods and to become liable to Ehrmann only for the price. But the trustee in bankruptcy, no doubt very prudently, taking a careful view of the subject, although there was a claim, does not appear to support it, and it was explained to us that he took that course on the view that he could not, as representing Anderson's creditors, get the necklace from the pawnbroker except upon the footing of paying his advance, and that if he got it upon the footing of paying the advance, he would be liable undoubtedly to Ehrmann for the contract price to him. In the circumstances of the case, the trustee for the creditors was plainly of opinion that it was not in the interest of the creditors to maintain that position, and accordingly assented to the view that Ehrmann might have the goods upon dealing with the pledgee Bryce—that is, paying the advance. My opinion is with your Lordship that Ehrmann cannot have them from Bryce on any other footing than that of paying the advance, and that upon doing so he may receive the goods, there being no claim maintained by the trustee in Anderson's bankruptcy that the goods should be handed over to him to make what he can of them in the interests of the creditors. For these reasons, I arrive at the same result which your Lordship has stated.

LORD TRAYNER.—I gather from what the Sheriff says in the note to the interlocutor appealed against, that his judgment would have been other than it is if he had been of opinion that the decision in the case of Brown v. Marr[1] was still authoritative. He thinks, however, that it is not; that its authority has been derogated from by the subsequent cases of Macdonald v. Westren[2] and Mitchell v. Heys & Sons.[3] I think the Sheriff has here fallen into error, for in my opinion the case of Brown[1] is still of authority, and the subsequent cases referred to do not impinge upon its authority at all. These subsequent cases are quite distinguishable from the case of Brown v. Marr,[1] and the decisions in them all are quite consistent. If this case in its particular circumstances falls within the law laid down in Brown v. Marr,[1] then in my opinion that case rules the present as an authority. But apart altogether from the case of Brown[1] it appears to me that the judgment appealed against is unsound.

I do not regard the contract made between Mr Ehrmann and Mr Anderson as a contract of sale and return, although it has some features in common with such a contract. Nor was it merely a transaction such as usually takes place where goods are sent by one person to another "on approbation." When A sends goods to B on approbation they are sent on the understanding that B if he approves of them may keep them at the price which is notified; if he does not approve he returns them to A. In such a transaction no other person's approval is asked or expected except the approval of B; no other person is or can be interested in the transaction but the sender and the receiver of the goods. But in this case, as is apparent from the correspondence produced, both Mr Ehrmann, the sender, and Mr Anderson, the receiver, intended something quite different. There was no expectation on the part of Mr Ehrmann that Anderson would take or keep the goods because he was pleased with them. He could, of course, have done so, but the primary purpose of both Ehrmann and Anderson was that the latter should be put in possession of goods which he might submit for the approval of purchasers from him, and to whom he might sell the goods at any price he pleased or could obtain. In order to carry out this purpose Ehrmann put Anderson in possession of the goods, with full liberty to sell them to anyone he pleased and at any price he might fix, the only consequence of such a sale being that Anderson would become liable for the price which Ehrmann had fixed, but not bound to account for the price he had received, however much it might exceed the price originally notified by Ehrmann. In these circumstances Ehrmann conferred on Anderson such a right in the goods sent as enabled the latter to give a good title to them to anyone who in good faith purchased them from him—a title which could not have been successfully challenged by Ehrmann. If, however, Anderson could have conferred such a title on a purchaser, I think he could equally confer the lesser title given to a pledgee who in good faith made advances on the security of the goods. If I am right so far, it follows that the appellant is entitled to hold the goods pledged with him by Anderson until his advances thereon are repaid.

The counsel for the respondent based their argument in support of the respondent's right on the terms of the approbation note sent by the respondent to Anderson with the goods in question. That note provides or stipulates that the goods should remain the property of the respondent until "invoiced by" him, and the effect of that, it was said, was to prevent any right of property passing from Ehrmann except in the way provided, namely, the invoicing of the goods by him to Anderson. I think the answer to this contention is twofold. In the first place, the provision was made to secure Ehrmann in his right of property as in a question with Anderson or Anderson's creditors, so long as the goods were in Anderson's possession. It was not intended to continue in Ehrmann a right of property preferably to any right granted by Anderson in favour of some third person, the granting of such a right being, in the contemplation of the parties, one which it was the primary purpose of the contract or transaction to enable Anderson to give. But, secondly, if the invoicing of the goods by Ehrmann to Anderson gave the latter a full right of property that right was so given. In April 1903 the goods in question were invoiced by Ehrmann to Anderson. The Sheriff thinks this transference of property may be set aside on the ground that Ehrmann was induced to make it by the fraud of Anderson. I do not concur in that view. It appears to me that Anderson's repeated statement that he had a customer whom he expected to purchase the goods (statements I assume to be false) was not the inducing cause of the invoicing and transference. It will be observed that Anderson did not ask Ehrmann to invoice the goods to him—that was a proposal which emanated from Ehrmann. And what induced Ehrmann to invoice the goods was his own anxiety to have Anderson personally liable for their price. In effect what Ehrmann said to Anderson was this, Whether you have a customer to take the goods or not I must either have them back or you must take them yourself and become liable for their price, and for that price I will take your bill. Anderson's reply was,—Very well, I will accept your terms and grant the bills—and he did so. I see here no fraud on the part of Anderson inducing the contract of sale which made him the owner of the goods. If that was a good sale, and gave Anderson a perfect title to the goods, that perfect title accrued to the appellant, assuming that prior thereto his title was defective or invalid.

Bryce v. Ehrmann.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to hold the goods in question so long as the advances he made on the security thereof remain unpaid. The trustee on Anderson's estates does not appear to contest the judgment by which his claim to the property as part of Anderson's estate has been negatived. As in a question between them, therefore, the right of property must be taken to be in Ehrmann. In these circumstances, the appellant not objecting, it will carry out my view if Ehrmann is preferred to the fund in medio in terms of his alternative claim. This is, in effect, a return to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, in all of whose findings I am not to be considered as concurring.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The Sheriff has repelled the claims of Anderson's trustee and the appellant Bryce, and preferred the claimant Ehrmann to the subject in medio.

I understand that Anderson's trustee has acquiesced in this judgment, and he was not represented at the hearing before us. It is therefore only necessary for us to decide on the claims of Ehrmann and Bryce. In my opinion the judgment of the Sheriff is wrong. I think that the claimant Bryce, the pawnbroker, is entitled to retain the necklace until repaid the advances made by him to Anderson, on the security of the necklace; and that the claim for Anderson's trustee now being out of the way, Ehrmann will be entitled to delivery of the subject on his repaying to Bryce the amount advanced to Anderson, with interest.

The Sheriff's judgment proceeds in a great measure upon the assumption that the case of Brown v. Marr[1] is no longer law, and in particular that it was overruled by the subsequent case of M'Donald v. Westren.[2] In this I think he is wrong. The facts in the case of M'Donald v. Westren[2] were different in this respect, that at the date of the retail jeweller's bankruptcy the goods sent to him by Westren on a contract of sale or return were still in his possession. The question arose not between the wholesale jeweller and some one to whom the retail jeweller, Fraser, had sold or pledged the goods, but between the wholesale jeweller and Fraser's trustee. In that case Fraser had not declared his option to buy, and had exercised no right of property in the goods by selling or pledging them. They were still in his possession, and on that ground the Court decided as in a question between Westren and Fraser's trustee that the property in the goods never passed to Fraser, and consequently had not passed from him to his trustee.

That was the true ground of judgment, and although at the close of his opinion Lord Young indicated some doubt of the judgment in Brown v. Marr,[1] it is plain that his remarks were, and were intended to be, obiter.

On the other hand, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Moncreiff), who took part in the judgment in Brown v. Marr,[1] was at pains to distinguish the two cases.

Again, in the case of Mitchell v. Heys & Sons and Others,[3] Brown v. Marr[1] was treated both by the Lord Ordinary and Lord Kinnear as still a binding authority. No better exposition of the ground of judgment in Brown v. Marr[1] could be given than that of Lord Kinnear in distinguishing that purpose Ehrmann put Anderson in possession of the goods, with full liberty to sell them to anyone he pleased and at any price he might fix, the only consequence of such a sale being that Anderson would become liable for the price which Ehrmann had fixed, but not bound to account for the price he had received, however much it might exceed the price originally notified by Ehrmann. The counsel for the respondent based their argument in support of the respondent's right on the terms of the approbation note sent by the respondent to Anderson with the goods in question. That note provides or stipulates that the goods should remain the property of the respondent until "invoiced by" him, and the effect of that, it was said, was to prevent any right of property passing from Ehrmann except in the way provided, namely, the invoicing of the goods by him to Anderson. I think the answer to this contention is twofold. In the first place, the provision was made to secure Ehrmann in his right of property as in a question with Anderson or Anderson's creditors, so long as the goods were in Anderson's possession. It was not intended to continue in Ehrmann a right of property preferably to any right granted by Anderson in favour of some third person, the granting of such a right being, in the contemplation of the parties, one which it was the primary purpose of the contract or transaction to enable Anderson to give. But, secondly, if the invoicing of the goods by Ehrmann to Anderson gave the latter a full right of property that right was so given. In April 1903 the goods in question were invoiced by Ehrmann to Anderson. The Sheriff thinks this transference of property may be set aside on the ground that Ehrmann was induced to make it by the fraud of Anderson. I do not concur in that view. It appears to me that Anderson's repeated statement that he had a customer whom he expected to purchase the goods (statements I assume to be false) was not the inducing cause of the invoicing and transference. It will be observed that Anderson did not ask Ehrmann to invoice the goods to him—that was a proposal which emanated from Ehrmann. And what induced Ehrmann to invoice the goods was his own anxiety to have Anderson personally liable for their price. In effect what Ehrmann said to Anderson was this, Whether you have a customer to take the goods or not I must either have them back or you must take them yourself and become liable for their price, and for that price I will take your bill. Anderson's reply was,—Very well, I will accept your terms and grant the bills—and he did so. I see here no fraud on the part of Anderson inducing the contract of sale which made him the owner of the goods. If that was a good sale, and gave Anderson a perfect title to the goods, that perfect title accrued to the appellant, assuming that prior thereto his title was defective or invalid.

Bryce v. Ehrmann.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to hold the goods in question so long as the advances he made on the security thereof remain unpaid. The trustee on Anderson's estates does not appear to contest the judgment by which his claim to the property as part of Anderson's estate has been negatived. As in a question between them, therefore, the right of property must be taken to be in Ehrmann. In these circumstances, the appellant not objecting, it will carry out my view if Ehrmann is preferred to the fund in medio in terms of his alternative claim. This is, in effect, a return to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, in all of whose findings I am not to be considered as concurring.

LORD MONCREIFF.—The Sheriff has repelled the claims of Anderson's trustee and the appellant Bryce, and preferred the claimant Ehrmann to the subject in medio.

I understand that Anderson's trustee has acquiesced in this judgment, and he was not represented at the hearing before us. It is therefore only necessary for us to decide on the claims of Ehrmann and Bryce. In my opinion the judgment of the Sheriff is wrong. I think that the claimant Bryce, the pawnbroker, is entitled to retain the necklace until repaid the advances made by him to Anderson, on the security of the necklace; and that the claim for Anderson's trustee now being out of the way, Ehrmann will be entitled to delivery of the subject on his repaying to Bryce the amount advanced to Anderson, with interest.

The Sheriff's judgment proceeds in a great measure upon the assumption that the case of Brown v. Marr[1] is no longer law, and in particular that it was overruled by the subsequent case of M'Donald v. Westren.[2] In this I think he is wrong. The facts in the case of M'Donald v. Westren[2] were different in this respect, that at the date of the retail jeweller's bankruptcy the goods sent to him by Westren on a contract of sale or return were still in his possession. The question arose not between the wholesale jeweller and some one to whom the retail jeweller, Fraser, had sold or pledged the goods, but between the wholesale jeweller and Fraser's trustee. In that case Fraser had not declared his option to buy, and had exercised no right of property in the goods by selling or pledging them. They were still in his possession, and on that ground the Court decided as in a question between Westren and Fraser's trustee that the property in the goods never passed to Fraser, and consequently had not passed from him to his trustee.

judgment. He says (21 R., p. 613) :—"The main ground of judgment was that by such a contract all the substantial rights of ownership pass to the buyer. He has an option to return the goods within a stipulated time instead of paying the price. But whenever he exercises any right of property, as by selling or pledging the goods, the option ceases, and accordingly the title he may give to third persons dealing with him in good faith does not depend upon any authority derived from the vendor on sale and return, but upon his own absolute right of property. . . . The difficulty was that the contract had been obtained by fraud. But the answer is that contracts obtained by fraud are valid until they are rescinded, and therefore that they cannot be rescinded to the prejudice of rights and interests acquired by third parties in good faith and for value."

In Mitchell v. Heys & Sons[1] the goods came into the possession of Mitchell, Johnston, & Co. not under a contract of sale or return, but under a contract of hiring under which, of course, they had no power to appropriate or dispose of the rollers; and the Court held (I must assume rightly) that Wm. Mitchell, from whom they hired the rollers, had done nothing to induce Heys & Sons, to whom Mitchell, Johnston, & Co. had sent the rollers with cloth to be printed, to believe that the rollers were the property of Mitchell, Johnston, & Co. That is a very different case from the present and Brown v. Marr,[2] in both of which the goods were placed in possession of the retail dealer in order that he might dispose of them in the ordinary course of his business, there being nothing to shew an intending customer that the goods were held by the retail dealer under conditions which prevented him from disposing of them as his absolute property. It is new to me that a customer going into a jeweller's shop for the purpose of purchasing an article of jewellery is called upon to catechise the jeweller as to whether the goods are his absolute property and as to the conditions on which he is entitled to sell them. For the convenience of trade, I think that the customer in such circumstances is entitled to assume that the jeweller has an absolute power of disposal whatever may be the latent conditions under which the retail dealer holds possession of the goods. I am not aware of any other Scottish decisions which deal with Brown v. Marr.[2]

If then Brown v. Marr[2] has not been overruled it must be followed if it applies to the present case; and we must therefore next consider whether this case can be distinguished from it. If the so-called "approbation note" were to be read literally, we should perhaps be bound to hold that it was a condition of the contract that property in the goods should not pass until Ehrmann invoiced the goods to Anderson, although even then I should hold that a customer who did not know of the condition would be entitled to deal with Anderson on the assumption that he had full power of disposal. But when we look at the true nature of the transaction between Ehrmann and Anderson I think it is plain that the contract was one of sale or return. The purpose of the contract admittedly was not merely to give Anderson an opportunity of inspecting the goods and purchasing them himself, but in order that Anderson might endeavour to resell the goods. In point of fact the necklace in question was not in Ehrmann's possession, but remained with Anderson or with the pawnbroker from 19th December 1902 till 24th April 1903. Thus Anderson was clothed with the ostensible ownership of the goods, and the bona fides of the pawnbroker is not impugned. Anderson having thus exercised the right of ownership over the goods by pledging them, I think it is doubtful whether, had it been Ehrmann's interest to do so, he might not, if the fact of pledging had come to his knowledge, have refused to take the goods back and held Anderson liable in the agreed-on price on the ground that in the language of section 18, subsection 4 (a), of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, Anderson had done an act (viz., pledging) adopting the transaction, and that therefore the property had passed to Anderson to the effect of making him liable in the price.

It is right, however, to notice that ex facie of the contract the goods were to remain the property of Ehrmann until invoiced by him to Anderson. It seems to me that the only practical effect of that stipulation is that if (as in Brown v. Marr[1]) Anderson did not dispose of the goods by selling or pledging them, Ehrmann should be entitled to have them returned notwithstanding the bankruptcy of Anderson.

In any other view no sale could have been effected until an invoice was obtained from London.

If it were necessary for the disposal of the case I should be prepared to hold that even if we read the contract literally, Ehrmann did pass the property to Anderson on 24th April 1903 by invoicing the goods to him and taking bills for the price. This was not done at the request of Anderson, but on the initiative of Ehrmann, who was anxious to bring the thing to a point and fix Anderson with liability for the price of the goods. No doubt Anderson was anxious to conceal from Ehrmann that the necklace was in pawn, and in his letters he falsely alleged that he was in treaty with a customer, but on the other hand, it is plain from the correspondence that Ehrmann was indifferent whether Anderson got a customer or not, and pressed Anderson to take the goods over as his own property, and grant bills for the price. On the effect to be given to such false statements as Anderson made, I may refer to the opinion of Lord Ormidale in Brown v. Marr,[2] and the cases which he there refers to.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the interlocutors of both Sheriffs should be recalled, and the claims of Bryce and Ehrmann sustained to the effect which I have already indicated.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff, dated respectively 19th February and 13th June 1904: Find that on 13th December 1902 the claimant Ehrmann sent to Robert Anderson, jeweller, Glasgow, a diamond necklace, the subject in medio, on the terms specified in an approbation note which contained a provision that the said necklace should remain Ehrmann's property until invoiced by him, Anderson being in the meantime responsible for loss and damage, and the necklace while uninvoiced being returnable on demand: That it was the purpose of the said necklace being sent by Ehrmann to Anderson that Anderson should endeavour to effect a sale of the necklace, and that in the event of his doing so he should be liable to Ehrmann for the price specified in said approbation note: Find that on 18th December 1902 Anderson pledged the necklace to the claimant Bryce for a loan without the knowledge or consent of Ehrmann: Find that by letter dated 21st April 1903 Ehrmann proposed that Anderson should himself become the purchaser of the said necklace, and should grant bills in his favour for the price thereof: Find that Anderson agreed to said proposal and accepted bills for the price, whereupon said necklace was invoiced by Ehrmann to Anderson on 23d April 1903: Find that said bills were subsequently dishonoured, and that Anderson became bankrupt on or about 9th July 1903: Find that Ehrmann was not induced to enter into the said transaction with Anderson on 23d April 1903 for the sale of the necklace by Anderson's concealment of the fact that he had pledged the necklace to Bryce; but further find in respect of the terms of the contract between Ehrmann and Anderson that Anderson was in a position to pledge said necklace, and validly pledged the same to Bryce accordingly: Find that the claimant Galbraith not now insisting in his claim, the claimant Ehrmann is entitled to obtain delivery of the subject pledged upon repayment to Bryce of the amount advanced by him upon the security thereof, with interest on said amount at the rate of 15s. per month from 19th August 1903 until the date of said repayment, as stipulated in the contract of pledge: Therefore, subject to said conditions as to repayment of the advance to Bryce, rank and prefer the claimant Ehrmann to the subject in medio: Repel the claim of the claimant William Brodie Galbraith: Find it unnecessary to dispose of the claim of the appellant Bryce, and decern."

Certain holders of fully paid-up preference shares, representing less than one-thirteenth of the share capital of a company, presented a petition for its compulsory winding-up, on the ground that in the circumstances it was just and equitable that it should be wound up.

advertisement, and service, appearance was made for the company, for the holders of first and second debentures, and for almost all the creditors whose respective claims exceeded £50. Their counsel moved the Court to dismiss the petition without pronouncing an order, and stated that the intimation craved would be prejudicial to the credit of the company.

The Court, after considering minutes lodged by the petitioners and by the objectors, and coming to the conclusion that the winding-up of the company would be detrimental to all concerned, and having regard to the wishes of the creditors and of the great majority of the shareholders, refused to order intimation, and refused the prayer of the petition.

2D DIVISION.

THIS petition was presented by William Black and others, holders of fully paid up preference shares in the United Collieries, Limited, a company having its registered office in Glasgow, praying the Court to order the Company to be wound up by the Court.

Of the thirteen petitioners named in the petition two disclaimed on the day after its presentation. The remaining eleven held preference shares to the extent of £136,488. The total share capital of the company, which was all paid up, amounted to £1,800,572.

On the case being called in the Single Bills counsel for the petitioners moved for an order for intimation, advertisement, and service. Counsel for the Company and others, who appeared as objectors, moved the Court to refuse the order and to dismiss the petition de plano.

The Court delayed consideration of the motion for intimation, and allowed the parties interested to lodge minutes. Minutes in opposition to the petition were lodged by the Company, the first and second debenture-holders, and creditors of the Company.

The minuters stated that a compulsory winding-up would result in a forced sale of going concerns, and cause great loss to the creditors and a complete loss of the shareholders' capital. This would be avoided by the issue of income debenture stock to the shareholders as resolved upon by the Company in August 1904.

On 18th October parties were heard in Single Bills upon the petition and minutes. The respective interests of parties and the nature of the objections sufficiently appear from the opinion of Lord Trayner.

Argued for the minuters;—An order for intimation and advertisement and service would injuriously affect the credit of the Company, and the Court would not pronounce it if satisfied that the petition was groundless.[1] In the late case of Wotherspoon v. Brescia Mining and Metallurgical Company, Limited,[2] where such an order was pronounced in spite of opposition like the present, it was admitted on all hands that there must be a winding-up, and the sole question at issue was whether the winding-up should be voluntary or judicial. In such circumstances the interests of the Company could not be prejudiced by the order. The issue of the income debenture stock was the best method of saving the Company; even if it were not, that did not entitle a small minority of shareholders to stop the Company.[3] The cases cited on the other side were very special, and the facts here were entirely different. If the minority maintained that the resolution was ultra vires, their remedy was interdict, not a petition to wind up the Company.[4]

The undernoted authorities were also cited.[1]

Argued for the petitioners;—There was a case here for inquiry, and therefore the usual order for advertisement should be made. The Oregonian case[2] was the only one in which such an order had been refused, and that was a very special case, where the petition was presented by a creditor whose debt when the case came before the Court had been paid. The present case more resembled Wotherspoon v. Brescia Mining and Metallurgical Company.[3] The case presented by the petitioners was that the whole history of the Company shewed a gradual process by which debenture-holders had obtained the complete control of the Company and were acting in such a way as practically to deprive the shareholders of any interest in the Company. They averred, and were prepared to prove, that the greater part of the debentures were held by one financial group, who were using their influence to wreck the Company. It appeared from the report of the committee of debenture-holders that the Company, though it might be able to pay its debts, was in financial straits. It was not maintained that these difficulties were, taken alone, a ground for winding up the Company, but they formed an element to be taken into account in considering whether it was just and equitable that it should be wound up. In these circumstances shareholders were entitled to have the Company wound up, even although they were a minority, and did not maintain that the Company was unable to pay its debts.[4] In any event, a case for inquiry had been presented.

At advising,—

Lord Trayner.—In this petition we are asked (1) to order intimation and advertisement of its presentation, and (2) thereafter, with or without answers on the part of those called as respondents, to order the United Collieries Company to be wound up by the Court under the provisions of the Companies Acts. Several parties representing different interests (who they are and what their interests I shall notice hereafter) have appeared and object to our making any order in this petition. We have had a full and able debate from both sides of the bar, and we are now to determine whether any, and if so what, order should now be pronounced.

The petitioners are shareholders in the Collieries Company, and the two grounds on which their petition is based are—(1) that the Company is unable to pay its debts, and (2) that it is just and equitable that the Company should be wound up. The first of these grounds was not maintained by the petitioners, and I cannot see how they could have maintained it. If the statement that the Company is unable to pay its debts—that is, that the assets of the Company are insufficient to meet its liabilities—is true, then the petitioners have no interest to insist in the petition, for if the Company has not assets sufficient to meet its liabilities, there can obviously be no reversion for distribution among the shareholders. If, on the other hand, the statement is not true, then as a ground of petition it disappears.

Conceding that this was so, the petitioners maintained that, nevertheless, the financial straits of the Company and its want of ready money with which, if called upon, to discharge all claims that could be made against it, was a circumstance, and a circumstance of weight, to be taken into account in dealing with the second ground, namely, that in the whole circumstances disclosed it was just and equitable that the Company should now be wound up. I concur in that view, and have accordingly taken the present condition of the Company into consideration in making up my mind whether it was just and equitable that the Company should now be wound up. But I have also taken into consideration other circumstances which appear to me to be of at least equal weight.

There are thirteen petitioners named in the petition, but of these, two disclaimed the petition by letter the day after its presentation. The eleven petitioners hold shares (all fully paid) to the extent of £136,488 out of a share capital (all paid up) of £1,800,572—that is, the petitioners represent less than 1/13th of the share capital. The petition is opposed by (1) the Company, which presumably represents the shareholders who are not petitioners—that is, shareholders who represent 12/13ths of the share capital; (2) the first debenture-holders, who are creditors of the Company to the extent of £942,900; (3) the second debenture-holders, who are creditors to the extent of £348,241; (4) the waggon companies mentioned in the petition, who are creditors to the extent of £300,000; and (5) by all the trade creditors of the Company, fifty-two in number (except three or four), whose respective claims exceed the sum of £50. From this it appears that the interests of the opposing respondents far exceed the interests of the petitioners, even taking the shares of the latter as of par value, which at present they are not. It also appears, no doubt, that the Company is deeply indebted, but it is not maintained (as I have already said) that the assets of the Company are not sufficient to meet all claims. That, however, will depend upon whether the assets of the Company are valued or realised as for a going concern. If the Company was ordered to be wound up and its assets separately disposed of under a forced sale, which is what would result from a winding-up, it is pretty evident that a large loss would be incurred. Part, and no inconsiderable part, of the Company's assets consists of the rights they hold under their mineral leases, some of which would or might be rendered valueless as subjects of sale by reason of the provision that they are not assignable. It is plainly therefore in the interests of the creditors, and indeed of all concerned, that nothing should be done which would impair the value of the Company's assets, and a forced realisation of these would necessarily do so. I have not forgotten what was urged upon us by the petitioners' counsel as to the character of the proposal (the issuing of profit debenture stock) by which it was hoped to relieve the Company from its present difficulties, nor as to the past bad management of the Company, nor the control of the Company in future by the debenture-holders or some of them. But I more than question the relevancy of these considerations. Looking to the whole circumstances, and having regard to the wishes of the creditors, and a large majority at least of the shareholders (whose wishes we are by the Companies Acts entitled to give effect to), I have come to the conclusion that there is no case made out for winding up the Company, a course which, in my opinion, would be seriously detrimental to the interests of all concerned. That being my opinion, I am against ordering any intimation or advertisement of the application, especially as we were assured by the respondents' counsel that, on his information, it would among business men (and probably I suppose on the Stock Exchange) be injurious to the Company's interests if even an order for intimation were made, such an order being regarded (however erroneously) as an indication that there was a prima facie case for a winding-up. In my opinion, therefore, this petition should de plano be refused.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF, not having been present at the hearing, gave no opinion.

C D, Defender (Reclaimer).—Jameson, K.C.—R. Scott Brown.

Reparation—Slander—Relevancy—Statement affecting credit of solicitor.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer, a solicitor in a country town holding several public appointments of trust, averred that the defender had stated that the pursuer had been "cleaned out and lost his all," and that in consequence the pursuer had suffered in his reputation and business.

Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue on the ground that it was not unreasonable to suppose that the statement might have injured his reputation and credit.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

A B, a solicitor in the country town of X, brought an action of damages for slander against C D, manufacturer there.

The pursuer averred that he was a partner in a firm of solicitors, which had for many years carried on business in X, and that he held several important public appointments of trust in X. (Cond. 3) "After his return [from holiday] the pursuer discovered that an extraordinary story of the most damaging character had been put into circulation by the defender of and concerning the pursuer, and had thereby gained currency in and around X to the effect that the pursuer had lost his whole means by speculating, and that the pursuer was a ruined man." (Cond. 4) "In particular . . . the defender in presence of . . . stated that the pursuer was cleaned out and had lost his all by speculation, and that he was a ruined man, or used words of the like import and effect. . . ." (Cond. 6) "The said statements made by the defender as aforesaid were of and concerning the pursuer, and were false and calumnious. They were intended by the defender to represent that the pursuer was a speculator, that by his speculation he had lost his whole means, that he was a ruined man, who as a professional man was discredited, and whom it would be unsafe to trust with money, or with the investment of clients' means or management of their affairs involving trust. The pursuer has among his clients several well-to-do farmers and other residents in the country districts to whom the idea of speculation, or even of ordinary dealings in stocks and shares except for permanent investment, is repugnant. Moreover, owing to the occurrence recently in the West of Scotland of cases in which clients have sustained heavy losses through defalcations by solicitors, who had been engaged in speculation, in which they had lost their means, public opinion is very sensitive to any suggestion that a solicitor has incurred such losses, and a charge of the kind is seriously detrimental to him in his profession." (Cond. 7) "By and in consequence of the said false and slanderous statements the pursuer has suffered greatly in his feelings and reputation. The defender's statement has also injured him in his reputation and business, and he has thereby been subjected to annoyance and loss in connection with his business as a professional man. . . ."

The defender admitted that on the occasion referred to in cond. 4 he had in the course of casual conversation remarked,—"Have you heard the latest?"—meaning the latest gossip from X, and that on being asked by one of the occupants of the railway carriage what it was, he replied,—"It's reported that A B has lost his all." The defender further stated,—"No reference was made by the defender to speculation or any other cause whereby the pursuer might have lost his money. What was said was not stated as fact but merely as rumour, and interrogatively, and the matter was dealt with in the most incidental way."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is irrelevant. (2) The defender not having slandered the pursuer the action should be dismissed with expenses.

On 5th July 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) approved of the following issues proposed by the pursuer, and appointed the same to be the issues for the trial of the cause:—"Whether (1) on or about 14th April 1904, in a carriage of a railway train between . . . in presence and hearing of . . . or one or more of them, the defender falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that he was cleaned out and had lost his all, or used words of like import and effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) Whether, on or about 14th April 1904, in a carriage," &c., "the defender falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning pursuer that he was cleaned out and had lost his all by speculation or used other words of the like import and effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £2500."

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The words complained of did not imply that the pursuer had lost his money in any discreditable way, or that he was bankrupt and unable to pay his debts, and there was therefore nothing defamatory or injurious in the statement.[1] [LORD KINNEAR referred to Ersk. Inst. iv. 4, 81.]

Argued for the pursuer;—In considering whether the statement complained of was defamatory regard must be had to the position of the person concerning whom the statement was made. It was not unreasonable to suppose that such a statement might injuriously affect the business reputation and credit of a country solicitor, holding responsible offices.[2] The language used was therefore actionable, and the pursuer was entitled to an issue.

A B v. C D.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that both issues proposed by the pursuer should be allowed.

In considering whether the use of particular words may or may not have an injurious effect on the character of a person, it is very material to have regard to the position of the person in regard to whom the words were used, and the business he is carrying on. If the pursuer had been living on his private means the statement in a railway carriage that he was reported to have "lost his all" might have excited compassion, but it would not have injured him in his public reputation or purse. But the case is very different when the man is carrying on a business or profession by which he lives, and which requires that he shall possess such a character that people may safely trust him with their money. We know the nature of the business of a writer in a country town. It is quite common for women and other clients, where property belonging to them has been sold or a bond paid up, to leave the price or the money paid up in the hands of their law-agent until another investment is found for it. In other words, local solicitors frequently act as practically bankers of their clients. Now, the question is whether it is so certain that to say of a man in that position that he was cleaned out and had lost his all could not damage him that we should not allow the pursuer an opportunity of proving that it could and did. If it were proved that as a result of the statements made clients removed their money from his keeping, or took their papers out of his hands, this would shew very distinctly that the words were injurious. I am of opinion, then, that the pursuer should have an opportunity of proving his averments of injury.

What I have said with reference to the first issue applies a fortiori to the second issue. Experience proves that where an agent loses his own money in speculation, he not infrequently uses his clients' money in the same way, no doubt generally intending to replace it, but not infrequently being unable to do so. I therefore think that the issues should be allowed.

LORD ADAM.—The words complained of as being defamatory are that the pursuer "was cleaned out and had lost his all."

I agree with your Lordship that these words may not be libellous in certain circumstances, and in other circumstances may be extremely injurious. In this case the person of whom the words were spoken is a writer in a country town holding several important public appointments of trust. The pursuer avers that the statement has injured him in his reputation and business, that many of his clients were seriously alarmed by the rumours put into circulation by the defender, and that these things were the natural and direct results of the defender's statements. The question is whether the pursuer should be allowed to prove this, if it is the fact. Mr Jameson says that there is nothing defamatory in the actual words. But the passage from Erskine,[1] referred to by Lord Kinnear, is authority for the view that to impute bankruptcy to a man is a ground of action not because it reflects on his moral character, but because such an imputation may have the effect of ruining his credit. That is exactly the position here, and accordingly I think the issues should be allowed.

A B v. C D.

LORD M'LAREN.—There is no doubt that in the law of Scotland defamatory words affecting the credit of the person spoken of are actionable—that is, the law recognises that injury to commercial credit is a wrong for which reparation is granted. If anything were needed the passage in Erskine,[1] to which Lord Kinnear called attention, is sufficient. It is not necessary to lay down a criterion as to what words fall within this character and what words would fall outside. It has been decided that it is defamatory to say of a trader, or indeed of any person, that he is "insolvent." It has not been decided that you may make statements affecting the financial credit of an individual if you stop short of attributing insolvency. The distinction between an imputation of insolvency or bankruptcy and the present case is a very thin one. In the case of a writer or a merchant, to say that he had lost all his money would certainly be injurious to his credit. No solicitor can carry on a business worth having without credit, because in the ordinary course of business clients' money necessarily comes into his hands. To say of a solicitor that he was "cleaned out" and had lost his all is certainly calculated to injure his business. It is for a jury to say whether the words have had an injurious effect in this case.

If these words were not actionable I fail to see how the addition of the words "by speculation" would make a difference. Speculation is a word of very indefinite meaning. There is legitimate and illegitimate speculation. Thus in my view the one issue is merely a variation of the first.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I should assent to Mr Jameson's observation that it is not a sufficient reason to ground an action of defamation that the pursuer alleges injury. That is not enough if, in the opinion of the Court, it is clear that the words are not calculated to cause such injury. But then the pursuer describes his position as a professional man in a country town, so that his means of subsistence are dependent on the confidence of his neighbours in his capacity and credit as a man of business. It is not an unreasonable construction of the words used to say that they may have injured his means of subsistence and credit, and that being so he is entitled to an issue.

THE COURT adhered.

Nov. 1, 1904. Hope Johnstone v. Sinclair's Trustees.

1st Division. Lord Pearson.

Miss Olivia Sophia Sinclair, residing at Thurso Castle, died on 24th January 1894, leaving a last will and testament dated 20th May 1892, with codicil, dated 11th May 1893, both registered in the Sheriff Court Books of Caithness on 6th February 1894. Miss Sinclair by her will bequeathed to her trustees and executors (Charles Cecil Gordon Hope Johnstone, William James Hope Johnstone, and George Felix Standish Sinclair) "the sum of £6000 . . . upon trust that they . . . shall invest the same in their or his names or name . . . and shall pay one-third part of the annual income of the said sum of £6000, or the investments for the time being representing the same to the said Emelie Johnstone, the wife of my nephew William James Hope Johnstone, during her life, or until she shall marry again. And I declare that, subject and without prejudice to the trust in favour of the said Emelie Johnstone, lastly hereinbefore declared and contained, my trustees and trustee shall hold the capital and income of the said trust premises in trust for all the children or any the child of the said William James Hope Johnstone, who being sons or a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters or a daughter shall attain that age, or marry under that age, and if more than one, in equal shares. . . . Provided always, and I declare that my trustees or trustee may at any time or times raise any part or parts not exceeding in the whole one-half of the then expectant or presumptive or vested share of any child of the said William James Hope Johnstone . . . under the trusts of this my will, and pay or apply the same for his or her advancement or benefit as my trustees or trustee shall think fit, but so that no such part or parts shall be raised and applied as aforesaid during the existence of any prior interest or interests therein under this my will —without the consent in writing of the person or persons—having such prior interest or interests. . . ."

The codicil contained the following declaration:—"I declare that my said trustees or trustee shall hold my said residuary estate upon the trusts following—(that is to say) . . . as to another equal third part or share thereof, upon the like trusts and with and subject to the like powers, provisoes, and declarations in all respects, for the benefit of Emelie Johnstone, the wife of my said nephew William James Hope Johnstone and the issue of the said William James Hope Johnstone as are in my said will declared and contained in their favour concerning the sum of £6000 and the investments for the time being representing the same."

On 12th March 1903 William James Hope Johnstone and his wife, Mrs Emelie Johnstone were both alive, and had six children, three of whom had attained majority, and three of whom were still in minority.

On 12th March 1903 the three children who had attained majority (Adelaide Olivia Hope Johnstone, George Granville Hope Johnstone, and Wentworth Francis Hope Johnstone), brought the present action against (1) the trustees and executors under Miss Sinclair's will; (2) the three minor children of William James Hope Johnstone; and (3) the said William James Hope Johnstone as their curator-in-law. The summons concluded, inter alia, for declarator that under Miss Sinclair's will and codicil "there was conferred on, and became vested in and payable to each of the pursuers at the dates of their respectively attaining majority, but subject always as hereinafter set forth, to the liferent of their mother, Emelie Johnstone, wife of the said William James Hope Johnstone, at least one-sixth share of the sum of £6000, and one-sixth share of one-third of the residue of the estate of the said Miss Olivia Sophia Sinclair." There was also a conclusion against the trustees and executors for payment to the pursuers of the shares claimed by them.

Defences were lodged by Miss Sinclair's trustees.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) In respect that a right to the testamentary provision in their favour under Miss Sinclair's will and codicil has vested in the pursuers, the defenders, the said Miss Sinclair's trustees and executors, are bound to denude and make payment thereof to the pursuers, subject to the retention of a sum sufficient to satisfy the liferent of the liferentrix.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers, on a sound construction of said last will and testament and codicil, not being entitled to the shares of the trust-estate claimed by them, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced as regards the conclusions for declarator and conveyance.

On 17th March 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—(After narrating the facts)—The rule of construction to which the pursuers appeal as entitling them to this declarator is that which received effect in the cases of Buchanan's Trustees (1877, 4 R. 754), and Ross v. Dunlop (1878, 5 R. 833); and in the English cases of Emmet (1880, 13 Ch. Div. 484), and Knapp v. Vassall (1895, 1 Ch. 91). The principle is thus stated by Lord President Inglis in the case of Ross:—'The general proposition is, that if a testator desires that a fund should be distributed in equal or different proportions among a class of children at a particular day, only the children in existence when that day arrives can receive a share; for they are the only children in existence at the day when payment is to be made. . . . The general rule is based on no stronger foundation than this—that you cannot carry out the direction to distribute at the particular time specified without giving the benefit solely to those who are in existence at that time; but if the testator has indicated with sufficient clearness that he intended others to participate, you must give effect to that intention.' The rule as settled by the English authorities is thus stated (2 Williams' Executors, 9th ed. 944):—'No child born after the period of distribution has any claim . . . and the children are excluded who are born after the fund becomes distributable in respect of any object or member of the class, or after the vesting in possession of any of the shares.'

"The same test was applied in all the cases I have mentioned. The date sought for in all of them was the date contemplated by the deed for the division of the fund—the date when it, or any share of it, was distributable or payable. In the case of Buchanan's Trustees the deed provided that on the death of the liferentrix the trustees should hold and apply the fund and the income thereof to and for behoof of all the lawful children of A., 'payable the several children's shares to the sons on their attaining twenty-five, and to the daughters on attaining that age or being married.' In the case of Ross, the trustees were directed to divide and apportion the fund among nephews and nieces and their descendants, declaring that the provisions of minors should not vest and be payable until they respectively attained majority. In Emmet's case the shares were directed to be conveyed, assigned, paid, or transferred to sons on their respectively attaining twenty-one, and to daughters on their respectively attaining that age or being married. And in Knapp v. Vassall it was declared that the shares of the settled fund should be for the portions of such younger children as should attain twenty-one, or being daughters should marry, the share of each

The pursuers reclaimed, and intimated at the discussion that a minute had been lodged by Mrs Emelie Johnstone consenting to the release of the fund so far as her liferent was concerned, except to the extent of one-third.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was settled law in England that where a fund was to be distributed among a class of children who should attain twenty-one, only those children were entitled to participate who were in existence when the eldest child attained twenty-one.[1] The same rule had been applied in Scotland.[2] The period of distribution had arrived when the eldest child attained twenty-one, and the trustees were not entitled to hold for nascituri.[3] child to be paid on vesting or the death of the survivor of A and B, whichever should first happen.

"The question then is, what is the period of distribution or payment under this will? Has it yet arrived as to any of the shares? In my opinion it has not. I think the will clearly indicates that for anything that has yet happened, there is to be no payment or division at present. In the first place, the trust is for all the children of Mr Hope Johnstone who shall attain the age of twenty-one, or being daughters shall marry under that age, in equal shares. This, of course, is not conclusive, but it is a strong indication, to begin with, that the pursuers' view would not further, but would defeat, the intention of the testatrix. Then the trust is 'to hold,' not even 'to hold and apply,' as it was in the case of Buchanan's Trustees, and there is an entire absence of any words which could be construed into a direction to divide or to pay, in any of the events which have yet happened. In the third place, it is expressly declared that the trustees may at any time or times raise any part or parts not exceeding in the whole one-half of the then expectant or presumptive or vested share of any child . . . under the trusts of this my will, and pay or apply the same for his or her advancement or benefit, as my trustees shall think fit, but so that no such part or parts shall be raised and applied as aforesaid during the existence of any prior interest therein under this my will without the consent in writing of the person having such prior interest.' This clause negatives the idea that a vested share, any more than an expectant or presumptive share, is payable as matter of right to any child so long as any prior interest subsists; and it clearly contemplates that, subject to the trustees' discretionary power to make advances, all such shares are to remain in the hands of the trustees until the death or second marriage of Mrs Hope Johnstone, or possibly the death of Mr Hope Johnstone. I apprehend that this is a purpose which will receive effect, as it is in furtherance of the original intention expressed in the will, namely, that all the children of Mr Hope Johnstone who may attain twenty-one, or being daughters may marry, shall benefit in equal shares. It is true that the trustees, in making advances to a child under the clause just quoted, are restricted to one-half of the child's share, and this involves a calculation as to the amount of the child's share. But I apprehend that the trustees, in making this calculation for the purpose of any given advance, would simply take account of the number of children in existence when the advance was made, leaving any excess or defect to be rectified when the balance of the share becomes payable.

"I hold that no shares are presently payable to the pursuers, and therefore that the action must be dismissed."

Nov. 1, 1904.
Hope Johnstone v Sinclair's Trustees.

Argued for the respondents;—The rule followed in England had never been adopted in Scotland. There was here no direction to pay or apply, but a direction "to hold." The clear intention of the testatrix was that the trustees should hold the fund until the class entitled to succeed was definitely ascertained on the death of the father.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Everything has been said which could be advanced in support of this reclaiming note, but the argument has failed to satisfy me that the position contended for the reclaimers is tenable. The Lord Ordinary has given a very clear statement of the clauses upon which the question in the case depends, and on the grounds stated by his Lordship I am prepared to affirm his judgment. The proposal is, the trustees should pay a share of the fund in their hands to certain beneficiaries before it is known who will constitute the class entitled to participate in the fund. To accede to that proposal might cause grave injustice, and I am clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was right in refusing to comply with it.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says that we must look to the date contemplated by the deed for the division of the fund. That is the real question. If the direction in the deed is to divide at a particular time, for example, upon the eldest child attaining twenty-one, that is a perfectly distinct direction, and it does not matter that other children may subsequently come into existence, because the instruction is to pay at a particular date. That is not the case here. The direction is not to pay, apply, or distribute, but to hold in trust for all the children of William James Hope Johnstone, who being sons or a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters or a daughter shall attain that age or marry under that age, in equal shares. I cannot see how it can be consistent with that direction to ask the trustees now to pay to certain children when others may come into existence. If the trustees were to pay now, what could they say to post nati? There is here no question of vesting, and I can see no difficulty in the question. The trustees cannot tell who are the members of the class entitled to share, and therefore they cannot pay in equal shares.

LORD M'LAREN.—I base my opinion on the grounds developed in the Lord Ordinary's note, but as the judgment has been brought under review, and the question is put forward as one of general importance, I shall make some further observations. There are two bequests in the present case, but the question to be decided regarding them is one and the same. I shall consider the terms of the bequest of £6000. With regard to the income of this fund, a life interest is given to Mrs Hope Johnstone, and the trustees are directed to hold the capital and income (I presume the income after Mrs Hope Johnstone's death) in trust for all the children or any child of Mr Hope Johnstone, who being sons or a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters or a daughter shall attain that age or marry under that age.

There are cases where under a direction in general terms to pay at majority the question arises whether these words import a condition of the right of the legatee, or only amount to an administrative direction to pay. In this case it is not disputed that the direction quoted is a condition of the gift, the question is as to the meaning of the condition. Now, the gift is to a class of persons which is subject to increase or diminution. Mr Hope Johnstone survives, and we cannot assume that his existing children are the only children he will have. We are then met by the difficulty that until the class of beneficiaries is complete we cannot know what is the amount of the share of any individual beneficiary. With regard to the suggestion of a payment to account, that is a matter for the trustees' consideration. We have here only to consider the question of right. If there were no authorities to guide us, I should hold that since the class is not ascertained payment is not due. Certain cases, however, have been referred to which, proceeding on Lord Chancellor Loughborough's opinion in Andrews v. Partington,[1] lay down the rule that where a legacy is given to children when they shall attain the age of twenty-one, and one of the class has attained majority, the number of the class is fixed as at that date. This is a purely arbitrary rule. It has never been defended as affording a correct construction of testamentary provisions. But whenever the rule has been contested the Judges have said that Lord Loughborough's decision must be followed. This rule, however, has not been adopted into our legal system. On the contrary, in the passage from the judgment of Lord President Inglis in the case of Ross v. Dunlop,[2] referred to in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, the true principle of construction is very distinctly affirmed. If, as his Lordship points out, there is no direction to pay on the attainment of majority, but only a general right to share in the fund, and the class remains undetermined, then payment must be delayed until the class is determined. There have, indeed, been cases where there was an express direction to pay on attainment of majority, and we in this Division have authorised payment to the beneficiaries one by one. Here, however, in the event that has happened, there is a virtual trust to hold until the attainment of majority by all the children, and the trustees must therefore keep up the trust until the death of the father, when the class will be definitely ascertained.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

Duffy v. Young.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

MICHAEL DUFFY, labourer, 55 Causeyside, Paisley, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Paisley against William Young, carriage-hirer, Paisley, concluding for payment of £500.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that on 13th June 1904 while crossing Sunnyside, Paisley, he was knocked down and run over by an omnibus and three horses belonging to the defender, and in charge of a servant of the defender. (Cond. 3) "At the time of the accident the horses to which said omnibus was attached were being driven in a furious and reckless manner by defender's said servant. The driver had no proper control over the animals, and failed to keep a proper outlook, or give any warning to the pursuer of the approach of said omnibus." (Cond. 5) "In consequence of said accident the pursuer sustained serious injuries to his chest, ribs, and over the body generally. He also sustained a severe shock to his nervous system. It is believed and averred it will be a considerable time before he is able to resume work."

On 11th October 1904, the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial.

The defender moved the Court to remit the case to the Sheriff Court for proof.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—There was here a genuine claim for a sum exceeding £40, and the pursuer was entitled to have his case tried by a jury.

LORD PRESIDENT.—No doubt we have sent cases back to the Sheriff Court, when it appeared, upon the face of the record, that the pursuer could only recover a very small sum. Although the averments in this case are somewhat narrow I cannot say that sufficient cause has been shewn for sending it back to the Sheriff Court. The pursuer avers that he was knocked down and run over by three horses and an omnibus, that he sustained serious injuries to his chest, ribs, and to his body generally, and that he also suffered a severe shock to his nervous system. At this stage we must assume that the pursuer may prove his averments, and, though they are somewhat vague, they contain allegations which shew that serious injuries might be proved. It appears to me therefore that the pursuer is entitled to have the case tried before a jury here.

LORD ADAM.—I have more than once expressed my opinion in this kind of case. The Legislature has laid it down that when the claim is above £40, the pursuer has a right to appeal for jury trial. No doubt we have sent cases back to the Sheriff for proof, but in my opinion we should only do so when it appears upon the face of the pleadings that the pursuer cannot possibly recover £40. In this case the pursuer claims £500, and on reading the record I cannot say that it is of the character to which I have referred. That being so, I am of opinion that we are not entitled to send the case back to the Sheriff.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. I do not think that the argument for sending these cases back to the Sheriff Court has much strength or substance in it. My impression is that the 40th section of the Judicature Act, with its analogue in the Court of Session Act, was intended for the benefit of defenders. It was quite unnecessary for the protection of a pursuer, who might raise his action in the Court of Session if he pleased. Where a trivial sum of damages is awarded in an action which has been removed from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session, the true remedy would be arrived at by applying a proper scale of expenses in the Court of Session. The difficulty which exists in dealing with this class of cases has arisen not from a difference of opinion as to the desirability of dealing with expenses, but from a difference of construction of our powers on the part of the two Divisions of the Court.

[1] M'Nab v. Fyfe, July 5, 1904, 6 F. 925.

Duffy v. Young.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. I think the pursuer has a right by statute to bring his case before a jury in this Court, provided his claim exceeds £40; and we cannot deprive him of that right unless it appears from his own statement that his true claim is for less than £40. I can recall a case where the pursuer's counsel summing up the items of his claim to the jury brought out a sum considerably less than £40 as the full amount of his demand, and made it clear enough that he had never expected to get more. That appeared to me to be an abuse of process, because it shewed that the pursuer was making a claim which he knew he could not sustain, in order to obtain a benefit which the statute would not have given him if he had made an honest statement. In the present case there is nothing to shew that there is not a perfectly genuine claim for £40, and therefore the pursuer is entitled to exercise his right to appeal for jury trial.

THE COURT refused the defender's motion and approved of the issue.

Expenses—Modification—Jury Trial—Appeal from Sheriff Court—Small amount awarded.—Held that a pursuer, who had appealed for jury trial and had obtained a verdict for £25 of damages, was entitled to expenses without modification, on the ground that, though the Court had power to relieve the losing litigant of any part of the expenses which might have been unnecessarily or unreasonably incurred by his successful opponent, no special reason for modification had been shewn in this case.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

PATRICK M'DAID, 37 Manse Street, Coatbridge, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow against the Coltness Iron Company, Limited, concluding for £250 at common law, or, alternatively, £156 under the Employers Liability Act, as damages for personal injuries caused by a piece of coal falling upon him while in their employment and on their premises.

On 24th February 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Strachan) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial. The defenders did not move to have the case remitted to the Sheriff Court for proof.

No. 8.

Nov. 4, 1904. M'Daid v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited.

A jury, sitting with Lord Kinnear, awarded the pursuer £25. The defenders had made no tender.

On the pursuer's motion to apply the verdict and for expenses, the defenders moved the Court to modify the expenses, looking to the small amount of damages awarded.

Argued for the defenders;—The Court would modify expenses in a case which should never have been appealed for jury trial.[1] It was true that the appeal was taken under section 40 of the Judicature Act,[2] but the case was really one under the Employers Liability Act, 1880,[3] and the provisions of that Act with regard to the removal of cases under the Act to the Court of Session[3] applied here. This was clearly an action which might properly have been tried in the Sheriff Court, and expenses should only be allowed to the pursuer on the Sheriff Court scale, or at least subject to substantial modification.[4]

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer had a statutory right to appeal for jury trial, and he had obtained a substantial award of damages, which was very much larger than the limit of £5 prescribed by section 40 of the Court of Session Act, 1868,[5] with regard to the recovery of expenses. Expenses should therefore be given without modification.[6]

LORD KINNEAR.—I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on the general question which was argued with so much citation of authority except this, that the power of the Court to relieve the losing litigant of any part of the expenses which may have been unnecessarily or unreasonably incurred by his successful opponent appears to me to be beyond question. Whether the mere fact that the sum awarded by the jury is a very small one is sufficient to shew that the expense of a jury trial was unnecessary and unreasonable is a very different matter. My own view is, that when that question arises it must be determined, not merely by reference to the amount awarded by the jury, but after taking into account all the circumstances of the particular case, except perhaps in the case which is specially regulated by the only statutory enactment which deals with this matter, I mean the 40th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868. That enactment does not apply to the present case, because the pursuer recovered a much larger sum than £5, and taking the whole circumstances into account I think that the pursuer in this case ought to have his expenses as taxed without further deduction. It is quite true that the amount of damages awarded him is small, and is below the sum of £40, which is the lowest sum for which he can appeal to this Court for jury trial under the Judicature Act; but I see no reason to suppose that he and his advisers—because this is a matter which is considered by the advisers of a man in the circumstances of the pursuer rather than by himself—did not honestly believe that he should have a larger sum than £40. I think he might fairly maintain to the jury that a larger sum than that was due to him, and indeed, although I am perfectly satisfied as to the sum given by the jury, I should not have been surprised if it had been somewhat larger. Juries differ on that question; and I see no reason to doubt that a demand for something more might honestly have been made. I think the case must be looked at in this way, because in my opinion the action is founded on a liability at common law, and was properly appealable under the Judicature Act. It is true that the pursuer made an alternative claim under the Employers Liability Act, but in my opinion it is clear that the case, as established by the verdict of the jury, was a valid case at common law, and therefore we do not require to consider the effect of the special clauses in the Employers Liability Act regulating the conditions under which an appeal under that statute may be taken. Accordingly I deal with the case as an appeal under the Judicature Act.

Now, the sum actually awarded is small, but I do not think the question between the parties as it went to the jury was really a question of amount at all. The defenders might have made it a question of amount by making a tender. They did not think fit to do so, but, on the contrary, they maintained vigorously, as they were quite entitled to do, that they were not answerable for any fault whatever, but that they had exercised all reasonable care and prudence in taking precautions for the safety of their workmen. That was the question, and on that the jury found a verdict against them. That was a question of fact well fitted for jury trial, because it depended on conflicting evidence which was mainly circumstantial, and although I am quite satisfied with the verdict of the jury, the facts as presented to them might have suggested different views to different minds. It is therefore quite possible that if the case had gone to the Sheriff, his judgment might have been appealed to the Sheriff-Depute, and his judgment again to this Court, so that there might have been three discussions instead of one. It is therefore by no means certain that the course now recommended to the pursuer would have been less expensive than that which he chose for himself. But then I am of opinion that it was for his advisers to consider which course should be taken, and that the pursuer had a right under the statute, if so advised, to say whether he preferred the verdict of twelve average jurymen to settle the matter once for all, or to have the judgment of a single Judge subject to a first and second, and possibly even to a third appeal, if any question of law could have been extracted from the findings of fact.

On the whole case, therefore, I am of opinion that there is not sufficient ground for depriving the pursuer of the small amount of damages awarded to him by the jury by the process of depriving him of the expenses of obtaining the award. I think the pursuer has been successful, and is therefore entitled to his expenses, and that there is no special reason for diminishing his claim.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT applied the verdict and found the pursuer entitled to expenses.

The contract bore—"The goods are deliverable in the usual and customary manner at Miramichi with all reasonable despatch, according to the season of the year, and agreeably to the custom of the port during the shipping season 1903." "Should the vessel or vessels fixed for this contract be lost previous to loading, and after the name being declared to the buyer, then sellers to have the option of substituting another vessel or vessels, or cancelling the contract."

The timber was shipped at Miramichi by the sellers, and the bill of lading taken in their own name. The bill of lading bore that the cargo was to be delivered in Glasgow to their order or assigns.

On the ship's arrival at Glasgow the sellers stopped the goods in transitu.

In an action of multiplepoinding brought in name of the shipmaster, the trustee of M'Dowall & Neilson, who had been sequestrated, contended that the place of delivery was Miramichi, and that the transitus there ended.

Held on a construction of the contract that the port of delivery was Glasgow, and not Miramichi, and that the goods were in transitu when stopped.

Bill of Exchange—Payment—Approved Acceptance—Stoppage in transitu—Custom of trade.—An "approved acceptance" in a mercantile contract means an acceptance to which no reasonable objection can be taken, and it is not competent to prove that by the custom of a particular trade it means an acceptance to which no objection has in fact been taken.

A contract of sale provided for payment by "approved acceptance." The seller on 18th September took the buyer's acceptance. On 25th September the seller stopped the goods in transitu. The buyer was sequestrated on 1st October. Held that the acceptance did not operate as payment so as to deprive the seller of his right to stop the goods in transitu.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

BY contract, dated 11th February 1903, J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, timber merchants, Chatham, Miramichi, New Brunswick, through their agents, Messrs Farnworth & Jardine of Liverpool, sold a quantity of wood to Messrs M'Dowall & Neilson, timber merchants, Glasgow. The contract was embodied in an agreement which, so far as material to the present report, was in the following terms:—

No. 9.

Nov. 8, 1904.
M'Dowall & Neilson's Trustee v. J. B. Snowball Co., Limited.

"C.i.f. Memorandum of agreement made this 11th February 1903 between M'Dowall & Neilson, of Glasgow, and J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, of Chatham, N.B. Whereby the former purchase, and the latter sell, through the agency of Farnworth & Jardine, of Liverpool, the under-mentioned wood goods as classified at port of shipment, and all foreign measure. The prices stated below are in British sterling money, including freight and insurance to Glasgow, or so near thereto as she may safely get always afloat. . . .

"The goods are deliverable in the usual and customary manner at Miramichi with all reasonable dispatch, according to the season of the year, and agreeably to the custom of the port during the shipping season 1903. . . .

"Should the vessel or vessels fixed for this contract be lost previous to loading, and after the name being declared to the buyer, then sellers to have the option of substituting another vessel or vessels, or cancelling the contract, but in the latter case the buyers to have the option of taking the goods at an equivalent f.o.b. price, and usual f.o.b. conditions calculated at the date of this contract, such option to be declared without delay.

"Payment.—Buyers to adopt usual charter-party, and pay freight in accordance therewith, balance of invoice to be by approved acceptance to sellers' or sellers' agents' draft, payable in London at one hundred and twenty days from sight of and in exchange for bill of lading, policy of insurance, and other shipping documents. . . .

"Should any difference arise under this contract, or should the shipment be delayed beyond the time named in this contract, the buyer shall not reject the wood if shipped, nor refuse payment for same in the manner stipulated, but such difference shall be referred to arbitrators. . . ."

The goods were duly shipped at Chatham on the steamer "Angelo Padre," chartered by the J. B. Snowball Company on 3d September 1903, and arrived in Glasgow, from Miramichi, on 23d September.

The bill of lading for the goods was taken in favour of the J. B. Snowball Company, and bore that the goods were to be delivered at Glasgow. The Snowball Company forwarded it to Messrs Farnworth & Jardine, their agents in Liverpool. On 15th September Farnworth & Jardine drew bills for the price of the wood on M'Dowall & Neilson, and forwarded them with the indorsed bills of lading and shipping documents through the agency of Messrs Singleton, Dunn, & Company, timber brokers. On 18th September M'Dowall & Neilson returned the bills accepted.

On the arrival of the "Angelo Padre" at Glasgow, Farnworth & Jardine, having learnt that M'Dowall & Neilson were insolvent, served upon the master of the ship a notice that they stopped the goods in transitu. In consequence of this notice the master of the "Angelo Padre" landed the wood in neutral custody, and it was afterwards sold under orders from the Court. Messrs M'Dowall & Neilson were sequestrated on 1st October 1903, and the bills granted by them for the price of the wood were dishonoured.

In these circumstances the present action of multiplepoinding was raised by the J. B. Snowball Company, as real raisers, in the name of A. Girardi, the master of the "Angelo Padre," as nominal raiser, the fund in medio being the amount received for the wood when it was sold under the orders of the Court.

Claims were lodged for the real raisers, the J. B. Snowball Company, and for Robert Reid, C.A., Glasgow, trustee on the sequestrated estate of M'Dowall & Neilson.

The J. B. Snowball Company claimed the fund in medio to the extent necessary to satisfy the price of the wood.

They averred that they had validly stopped the wood in transitu. With regard to the acceptance of the bills by M'Dowall & Neilson they made the following averment:—"The said M'Dowall & Neilson were at the date of receiving drafts and documents from Messrs Singleton, Dunn, & Company, insolvent, and aware of their insolvent position. The acceptances which they purported to grant to Messrs Singleton, Dunn, & Company of said drafts were not at the time they were granted capable of being discounted in the course of business on the acceptors' credit, and were not approved acceptances in the sense of the contract."

Reid claimed the whole fund in medio. With regard to the transit of the goods he averred:—"The said goods were duly delivered by the sellers to the buyers at Miramichi, the place of delivery mentioned in said agreement, and the transitus from the sellers to the buyers was thereupon ended. It was necessary for the buyers to give fresh instructions as to the destination of the goods, and the said M'Dowall & Neilson accordingly instructed J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, as their agents in that behalf, to ship the said goods to Glasgow. The said J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, in fulfilment of these instructions, chartered on behalf of the said M'Dowall & Neilson the vessel 'Angelo Padre' for the conveyance of the said goods from Chatham to Glasgow."

With regard to the acceptance of the bills he made the following averment:—"The said two drafts of M'Dowall & Neilson were accepted and approved of by J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, and are approved acceptances in terms of said agreement. They were accepted by J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, in full payment and satisfaction of and in substitution for their claim for the price of the goods under the contract of sale. The said J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, thereafter intended to rely, and did rely solely on the credit of the said two approved acceptances. In any event, by the usage and custom of the wood trade, an 'approved acceptance' is understood to mean a bill accepted in full payment and satisfaction of the price of the goods in respect of which the bill is granted. The said usage and custom is well known to the said J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, and both parties to the contract of sale had such usage and custom in contemplation when they entered into said agreement."

He pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The goods in question having reached their destination under said agreement, and having been taken possession of by the buyers, there was no stoppage in transitu. (3) In any event, the goods in question having been paid for, stoppage in transitu was not competent.

On 19th March 1904, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor, by which he sustained the claim for the J. B. Snowball Company.*

* "OPINION.—The first question in this case is whether the goods were in fact in transitu when the sellers stopped delivery on board ship at Glasgow.

"The trustee in bankruptcy of the purchasers avers that the goods were

Reid reclaimed, and argued;—The transitus here was at an end when the goods arrived at Miramichi. That was named in the contract as the place of delivery, and the mere fact that both parties contemplated that the goods should be forwarded beyond the port of delivery did not entitle the seller to stop them during their further voyage.[1] After that the master acted as the agent of the buyers, not of the sellers. Alternatively, it was relevantly averred that delivery had been made at Miramichi to the sellers in the capacity of agents for the buyers. That ended the transit.[2] A proof should be allowed, inter alia, of this averment. [In answer to the Court the reclaimer declined to amend his record by making more specific averments regarding the alleged delivery at Miramichi.] (2) The stoppage was ineffectual, because at its date the respondents were not unpaid sellers. They had taken the buyers' acceptance for the price, and that, in the circumstances of the present case, operated as payment. The con-delivered to them at Miramichi, and that the transitus as between seller and buyer then came to an end, and that the shipment of the goods by the sellers from Miramichi to Glasgow was carried out by the latter, not as sellers of the goods, but as agents whom the buyers employed for that purpose.

"If Miramichi was the destination for the goods under the contract between the sellers and the buyers, and if the buyers or their agents actually took delivery of the goods there, and then entered into a new contract with the sellers to carry the goods to Glasgow, I do not think that the voyage between Miramichi and Glasgow would be part of the transitus as between buyer and seller, because it would not be a transitus in pursuance of the contract of sale, and for the purpose of conveying the goods from the seller to the buyer.

"The averments of the buyers, however, are extremely bare. I do not think that, in the particular circumstances of the case, they are sufficiently specific to be remitted to probation.

"The circumstances, so far as admitted or established by the documents founded upon, are as follows:—J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, timber merchants in New Brunswick, sold through their agents, Farnworth & Jardine of Liverpool, a quantity of timber to M'Dowall & Neilson, timber merchants, Glasgow, conform to memorandum of agreement, dated 11th February 1903. The timber was shipped by Snowball Company on board the 'Angelo Padre' at Chatham, New Brunswick, for carriage to Glasgow. The 'Angelo Padre' was chartered by Snowball Company by charter-party, dated 15th December 1902, whereby it was provided that the ship should 'load at Miramichi for four consecutive trips, commencing first open water 1903,' a cargo of deals and battens, and therewith proceed to 'a direct safe port on the west coast of England, Glasgow, east coast of Scotland, London, or a safe port between Bordeaux and Havre.' The bills of lading of the cargo in question were granted by the master to Snowball Company, and the cargo was thereby made deliverable to their order or assigns. The vessel arrived in Glasgow on the 25th September 1903, and immediately upon her arrival, and before any of the cargo was discharged, a notice of stoppage in transitu was served upon the master on behalf of Snowball Company. The master then unloaded the cargo and put it into neutral tract here was in a form supplied by the sellers, and they had chosen to stipulate for payment by bill. When a seller had the option to take payment by bill or not, and elected to do so, it operated as payment.[1] The definition of an "approved" bill as a bill to which no reasonable exception could be taken only applied to cases where the question was whether the seller was bound to accept a bill as payment. (3) There was a relevant averment that by the custom of the wood trade—known to both parties—the fact that a bill was taken without objection made it an approved bill.

Argued for the respondents;—The goods were in transitu till they reached Glasgow. Until then they were not delivered to the buyers. The reclaimer's averments relating to delivery at Miramichi were too vague to be admitted to probation, and, on the most favourable construction, only amounted to an averment that the sellers delivered to themselves there as agents for the buyers. It was clear both on the custody, to hold for the true owners after payment of freight and charges. On the 15th of September the bill of lading, indorsed by Snowball Company, had been sent to M'Dowall & Neilson. The estates of the latter firm were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts on 1st October 1903, and the claimant Mr Reid was appointed trustee in the sequestration.

"The contention of the trustee, that the goods were not in transitu when on the voyage from Miramichi to Glasgow, is founded, in the first place, upon the terms of the agreement for the sale of the timber.

"That agreement is partly printed, and appears to be a form of agreement used by Farnworth & Jardine, the agents of Snowball Company in England.

"The agreement bears that M'Dowall & Neilson purchase, and J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, sell, through the agency of Farnworth & Jardine, the under-mentioned wood goods, and then it proceeds:—'The prices stated below are in British sterling money, including freight and insurance to Glasgow, or so near thereto as she may safely get always afloat. Lighterage, if any, to be at expense and risk of buyers. The goods are deliverable in the usual and customary manner at Miramichi with all reasonable despatch, according to the season of the year, and according to the custom of the port during the shipping season 1903.'

"There then follow provisions which seem to me to shew very clearly that it was contemplated that in any case the goods would require to be sent by ship by the sellers from Miramichi to their final destination. For example, it is provided that 'should the vessel or vessels fixed for the contract be lost previous to loading, and after the name being declared to the buyer, then sellers to have the option of substituting another vessel or vessels, or' (subject to certain conditions) 'cancelling the contract.'

"M'Dowall & Neilson's trustee founded upon the provision that the goods were deliverable at Miramichi, and argued that that established that the transitus as between seller and buyer terminated there. I am unable so to read the contract, because, as I have said, it contemplates that in order to carry it out it will be necessary for the sellers to send on the goods by ship from Miramichi, and the conditions upon which that is to be done are enumerated.

"I do not know precisely why the clause making the goods deliverable at Miramichi was inserted. I imagine, however, that the deals and battens required to be brought from up-country to Miramichi, where they could be authorities[1] and on the terms of section 45 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893,[2] that that was not delivery such as would put an end to the transit. (2) The fact that M'Dowall & Neilson's acceptance was taken for the price was not equivalent to payment. The trustee in sequestration did not deny that at the time the bills were accepted the acceptors were not in credit, and their bills could not have been discounted. If so, theirs was not an "approved acceptance," which meant an acceptance to which no reasonable objection could be taken.[3] (3) The reclaimer's averments as to custom of trade were irrelevant. Custom of trade could not alter the meaning of a phrase which had a fixed legal interpretation.

At advising,—

put on board ship, and one object of the clause certainly was to secure that the goods should be brought to Miramichi 'during the shipping season,' which I gather from the charter-party to mean when the bay is not closed by ice. I am not therefore satisfied that the clause meant more than that the goods were to be brought to Miramichi in a manner and at a time suitable for shipment.

"Further, I think that it is plain that the buyers must have named Glasgow as the destination of the goods. I do not see how otherwise Glasgow should have been mentioned, nor why the price should have included freight and insurance to Glasgow.

"The trustee, however, avers (and he asks proof of the averment) that 'the said goods were duly delivered by the sellers to the buyers at Miramichi, the place of delivery mentioned in said agreement, and the transitus from the sellers to the buyers was thereupon ended.'

"Now, I do not know whether that means that the goods were actually handed over to the buyers, or their agents, at Miramichi, or whether the averment is merely the inference which the trustee draws from the provision in the contract as to delivery at Miramichi, as he construes it.

"My impression is that the latter is the case, because the learned counsel for the trustee could not tell me to whom the goods were delivered. All the information he had was that there had been a good deal of correspondence between the buyers and the sellers as to the despatch of the goods from Miramichi. Snowball Company, on the other hand, say that no delivery was made to anyone at Miramichi.

"Now if actual delivery of the goods was given at Miramichi, the trustee sider it necessary to recapitulate them. I agree with the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived. The contention of the trustee that delivery was taken of the goods at Miramichi is not, I think, tenable. It is unfortunate that the word "deliverable" was used in the contract in connection with Miramichi, but I do not read that word as meaning to be delivered to the buyers at that port, but only that they were to be deliverable on board ship for transmission to this country with "all reasonable dispatch," as it is expressed, the meaning being that they were to be brought down country to the port of loading without any undue delay, so that they might be forwarded on and reach this country with all convenient speed.

In point of fact, the bill of lading contradicts the contention of the trustee, for the bill of lading was taken out not to the purchasers, as might have been the case had the purchasers received delivery at Miramichi, but to the sellers, who thus held the document the possession of which gave must know who was the representative or agent of the buyers to whom delivery was made, and I do not see my way to allow a proof of the averment with which I am dealing unless it is amended by adding a statement to that effect. I do not think that I would be justified in putting the parties to the expense of a proof upon an averment of doubtful relevancy, when the circumstances, the specification of which would make the averment relevant, must be known to the trustee if they actually existed.

"The trustee, however, contended that even assuming that the goods were not delivered to any third party representing the buyers at Miramichi, still the transitus there came to an end, because when the goods reached Miramichi nothing further could be done with them without further instructions. The leading authority founded upon was Dixon v. Baldwen (5 East, 175), where Lord Ellenborough said that the transitus had come to an end because 'the goods had so far gotten to the end of their journey that they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them in motion again, to communicate to them another substantive destination, and that without such orders they would continue stationary.'

"Now, in the first place, I do not understand why new orders from the buyers should have been necessary so far as fixing the ultimate destination of the goods was concerned. Glasgow was in fact the ultimate destination, and 'Glasgow' was named in the contract in terms which it seems to me could have no meaning unless it was the place to which it was intended that the goods should be sent; and as I have pointed out, freight and insurance to Glasgow were included in the price.

"But even assuming that when the goods arrived at Miramichi it was necessary for the buyers to give the sellers instructions where to send them, that, in my judgment, would make no difference. It is plain from the contract that the goods were in no case to remain at Miramichi, but were to be forwarded by ship from Miramichi by the sellers to the purchasers. Therefore, assuming that the goods remained for a time at Miramichi in the sellers' custody awaiting the buyers' instructions where to send them, the transit would not be at an end, because the sellers would not be holding the goods as the buyers' agents to take possession of and to keep them, but only for the purpose of forwarding them in fulfilment of the contract of sale.

"In the case of Dixon v. Baldwen the circumstances shortly stated were these: Battier of London was in the habit of buying cotton goods from Baldwen of Manchester to be forwarded to Metcalf & Company at Hull, for the purpose of being shipped by the latter to Hamburg. The course of dealing was, that after Metcalf & Company received the goods, they held them for Battier until they received instructions from him when and to them the power over the goods while they were on the voyage. I think it cannot be doubted that J. B. Snowball Company could at any time while the goods were on the voyage have given a good title to the goods to any purchaser they might have dealt with, they holding the bill of lading. They might be in the position that those who contracted with them for the goods would have a good action of damages against them if they failed to carry out their contract, but I do not see how it could be held that those who made a contract with them could have claimed and successfully asserted their right to the particular goods, on the footing that they had been delivered to them and had become their property by delivery.

The trustee desired a proof upon the question of delivery at Miramichi, but taking the view I have expressed I can see no ground for allowing a proof of the very meagre statements on this part of the case, and we were told at the debate that no proposal was made by the trustee to amend his record. It was admitted that nothing more definite could be stated.

whom to ship them to Hamburg. In ordering from Baldwen the goods in regard to which the question of the sellers' right to stop in transitu arose, Battier wrote to Baldwen specifying the goods and telling him to forward them to Metcalf & Company 'to be shipped to Hamburg as usual.' It was upon the latter words that the sellers maintained that the goods were still in transitu after they had been shipped to Hamburg by Metcalf & Company pursuant upon instructions which they had received from Battier.

"It was held that as between Battier and Baldwen the transitus ended when the goods were delivered to Metcalf & Company, the latter being Battier's agents to hold the goods altogether at his disposal. It seems to me that the circumstances in that case were substantially different from those with which I am dealing.

"A case much more nearly allied to the present is the Rosevear China Clay Company (11 Ch. Div. 560). In that case James, L.J., said—'The authorities shew that the vendor has a right to stop in transitu until the goods have actually got home into the hands of the purchaser, or of some one who receives them in the character of his servant or agent. . . . It seems to me that the mere fact that the port of destination was left uncertain, or was changed after the contract of sale, can make no difference.'

"In the same case Brett, L.J., said—'It seems to me that it can make no difference whether the destination of the goods is communicated to the vendor at the time of the contract for sale, or whether the destination is to be named after the contract but before the shipment.'

"I am therefore of opinion that unless the goods were actually delivered to the buyers or their representative at Miramichi, they were still in transitu during the voyage between Chatham and Glasgow.

"The next question is whether, assuming that the goods were in transitu when they were stopped by Snowball Company, the latter had not received payment of the price.

"In the memorandum of agreement it was provided—'balance of invoice to be by approved acceptance to sellers' or sellers' agents' draft payable in London at one hundred and twenty days from sight of, and in exchange for, bill of lading, policy of insurance, and other shipping documents.'

"On 15th September Farnworth & Jardine sent to M'Dowall & Neilson, through Singleton, Dunn, & Company of Glasgow, the bill of lading and two bills of exchange at 120 days, for £3378, 7s. 5d. and £3000 respectively, drawn by Farnworth & Jardine upon M'Dowall & Neilson. Upon 18th September the latter firm accepted the bills and returned them to Singleton, Dunn, & Company. The estates of M'Dowall & Neilson were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts on 1st October, and their

It was maintained by Mr MacRobert that Miramichi was the only place to which the sellers were bound to send, and therefore that it was the place of delivery. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that this was plainly not so, and that the contract contemplated that the goods would require to be sent on from there to their final destination, the conditions as to the right of the sellers to substitute other vessels than those named by them to the buyers indicating that the transaction was not at an end at Miramichi, and the taking of the bill of lading in the sellers' name is in entire consistence with this. The bill of lading also in its terms states Glasgow as the port of delivery.

I cannot doubt, therefore, that the goods were in transitu during the voyage to Glasgow, and that the sellers were entitled to exercise the right of stoppage, unless they did some other act which completed the buyers' right, so as to cause the goods to be no longer in transitu, but to be the delivered property of the other party to the contract.

trustee avers that on 5th October the bills were returned to him by Singleton, Dunn, & Company.

"The question therefore is, whether in these circumstances Snowball Company were unpaid sellers who were entitled to stop the goods in transitu.

"As a rule, when a bill is taken instead of present payment of a debt, and the bill is not paid at maturity, the creditor may sue for the debt just as if the bill had not been granted. In short, payment by bill is, in general, only conditional payment, and I do not think that it makes any difference that payment is stipulated to be by 'approved' bill, because that is a stipulation in favour of the creditor, an 'approved' bill having been held to mean a bill to which no reasonable objection can be taken.

"Now, here the bills were worthless, having been granted by M'Dowall & Neilson upon the eve of bankruptcy, and their estates having been actually sequestrated a few days afterwards. In such circumstances, it seems to me that Snowball Company cannot be held to have received payment of the goods unless either they contracted to take the bills as in full payment and discharge of the price, or so acted as to bar themselves from maintaining that they had not done so.

"The averment of M'Dowall & Neilson's trustee is as follows:—'They' (the bills) 'were accepted by J. B. Snowball Company, Limited, in full payment and satisfaction of and in substitution for their claim for the price of the goods under the contract of sale. . . . In any event, by the usage and custom of the wood trade, an 'approved acceptance' is understood to mean a bill accepted in full payment and satisfaction of the price of the goods in respect of which the bill is granted.'

"Now, in regard to the first of these averments, I do not know whether the trustee is merely stating what, in his view, is the legal result of the memorandum of agreement, or if he means to say that there were circumstances (which he does not specify) which shew that the bills were, in fact, taken in full payment and satisfaction of the price. If he means the former, I do not agree with him; if the latter, the averment, in my opinion, fails for want of specification.

"I am unable to read the memorandum of agreement as binding Snowball Company to take the bills as in full payment and satisfaction, even although they should turn out to be worthless. The stipulation in regard to 'approved acceptance' is contained in a clause which has the general heading 'Payment,' that word not being used in the clause itself. I may say, however, that I do not regard that as material, because I apprehend that the mere fact that in such a case the agreement says that payment is to be by bill, is not equivalent to a stipulation that the bill shall be taken

Nov. 8, 1904.
M'Dowall & Neilson's Trustee v. J. B. Snowball Co., Limited.

Now, the trustee maintains that this was done by the sellers taking acceptances for the price before the goods arrived in Glasgow, in pursuance of a clause in the contract, by which "balance of invoice" was to be by "approved acceptance to sellers' or sellers' agents' draft, payable in London at 120 days from sight of, and in exchange for, bill of lading, policy of insurance, and other shipping documents." The fact is that the bankrupts' acceptances were given on 18th September, and that the sequestration took place on 1st October. Can it be said in these circumstances that these were approved bills? Mr Bell, in his Principles, says that "an approved bill seems to import only a bill to which no reasonable objection can be made." Applying this test, can this be said of these bills, which, as the Lord Ordinary points out, were plainly worthless? But the trustee makes an as in satisfaction and discharge of the price, and renders the payment by bill otherwise than conditional. The clause provides for a variety of things. It commences: 'Buyers to adopt usual charter-party, and pay freight in 'accordance therewith.' Then follow the words which I have already quoted, to the effect that 'balance of invoice to be by approved acceptance,' and so on; and finally, it provided that 'if required, the buyer shall give sellers or sellers' agents an approved acceptance at thirty days' for advances made abroad on account of freight, receiving in exchange the captain's receipt and a policy of insurance for the amount. I do not think that there is anything in that clause to make the payment by bill other than a conditional payment.

"Coming now to the averment in regard to the alleged custom of trade, I would, in the first place, remark that as averred it seems to me to be no more than a statement of a proposition in law of general application. I do not doubt if sellers of goods in fact take a bill as 'in full payment and satisfaction' of the price, then the price will be held to be paid. What the trustee intends to aver, however, is, I understand, that, according to the custom of the wood trade, in cases where an approved bill is stipulated for, whenever the seller takes, without objection, a bill from the buyer, it is regarded as an approved bill, accepted by him in full payment and discharge of the price. In other words, the alleged custom is that by 'approved bill' is meant a bill of which the seller has indicated his approval by taking it, and not, as in the ordinary case, a bill to which no reasonable objection can be taken.

"Whether, however, that is, or is not, a correct statement of the view of the trustee, I am of opinion that this is a case in which it is not competent to prove an alleged custom of trade in order to construe the agreement. Such a proof could only be allowed on the grounds that the words in the agreement, 'approved acceptance,' were technical words of the trade, and required explanation of what they signified in the trade. These words, however, are not technical words of the wood trade, but are common in mercantile contracts, and have a well-known legal import. To allow evidence in such a case would therefore, it seems to me, be to practically hand over to the witnesses the construction of the contract, which is a matter for the Court alone. I may refer to the case of Calder v. Aitchison, 9 S. 777, 5 W. & S. 410; and Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Company, 15 R. 215, 17 R. (H. L.) 31.

"The result upon the whole case is that, in my opinion, unless M'Dowall & Neilson's trustee is in a position to amend his statements by making them more specific in the particulars to which I have referred, his claim to the whole fund in medio falls to be repelled, and he is only entitled to be ranked to the balance of the fund after payment to Snowball Company of the price of the goods."

averment of custom of trade, under which "approved bill" means a bill of which the seller has indicated his approval by taking it. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that these words must be construed according to their legal import in this contract, and that legal import is expressed as I have quoted above.

My view, therefore, upon the whole matter is that the trustee desiring to have a judgment on the record as it stands, and not proposing any amendment, the Court ought to adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and I accordingly so move your Lordships.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

The main contention presented by the reclaimer against the Lord Ordinary's judgment was based upon the clause in the agreement or contract of sale between the parties which provides that "the goods are deliverable in the usual and customary manner at Miramichi with all reasonable dispatch." I read that as referring to delivery at Miramichi for the purpose of shipment—not delivery there as to the buyer. The whole clause points to this—that there should be no undue delay in the shipment of the cargo. Under the contract the seller had to provide a ship to carry the cargo to Glasgow, and to pay freight and insurance to that port, and such an obligation on the seller rather points in the direction of the cargo being still under his control and at his risk until it reached its destination. I do not mean to say that full delivery of the cargo to the buyer could not have been made at Miramichi, so as to vest the buyer with full property, even although there remained on the seller the obligation to find a ship to carry it and also to pay freight and insurance. But certainly in the usual course a contract of sale c.i.f. contemplates delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge, not the port of shipment. However that may be, the question remains, was the cargo in point of fact delivered to the buyers at Miramichi? The Lord Ordinary justly shews that the averments in regard to this are very vague. The buyers were not personally at Miramichi, and could not therefore themselves receive delivery. Their averment is that they instructed the sellers to receive the cargo as for them, and instructed them to ship the same to Glasgow "as their agents in that behalf." But nothing is said as to when or how such instructions were given or sent, and this averment of agency is too vague and inadequate. It could and should have been made more precise if proof of it was desired. The claimant Reid (who now represents the buyers) was asked if he proposed to amend his statement on this matter, and the answer was that nothing more specific could be said than was already on record. But I think there is no need of further proof on this part of the case beyond what we already have. It is apparent that the sellers did not deliver the cargo to the buyers at Miramichi, or ship it there as agents for the buyers, for the bill of lading shews that they shipped it in their own name, deliverable to them or their assigns at Glasgow. So long as they held these bills of lading the cargo was under their control, and was so much their property that they could have conferred a right to it upon anyone to whom they pleased to indorse the bills of lading. But the terms of the bills of lading tend also to shew that Glasgow was the port of delivery, and not Miramichi. I come therefore to the opinion (with the Lord Ordinary) that the transit of the cargo, as between seller and buyer, did not terminate at Miramichi, but at Glasgow, and that being so, it was duly stopped in transitu by the sellers' notice to the ship on its arrival at the port of delivery.

The only other argument maintained on behalf of the claimant Reid was, that the buyer had paid for the cargo by accepting bills for the price in favour of the sellers, and that the latter were thereby barred from claiming the price of the cargo as on the contract of sale, or exercising any right as sellers—that the only right which remained to them was to operate diligence on the bills. I think it enough to say that in the circumstances of the case that argument is not in my opinion tenable.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. On both points I agree with the Lord Ordinary. On the first question of transit it is plain from the memorandum of agreement between the sellers and the buyers that the destination of the goods was Glasgow. The vessel to carry the goods from Miramichi was to be chartered by the sellers, and in point of fact it was chartered by them, and the bills of lading were taken in their own name. The prices for the goods included freight and insurance to Glasgow.

No doubt if on arrival of the goods at Miramichi they had been delivered to the buyers or their agent it might have been held that transit was at an end; but this was not done. The goods were put on board the vessel by the sellers, and were still on board when the stoppage took place.

The only clause upon which the claimant Reid can found is that in the memorandum of agreement,—"The goods are deliverable in the usual and customary manner at Miramichi," &c.

But this clause must, I think, be read in the light of the rest of the document, and so read amounts to no more than this, that the goods were to be brought to Miramichi in due time to be shipped there during the shipping season.

The second question is whether the claim for the sellers is barred by their having indorsed the bills of lading in exchange for acceptances by M'Dowall & Neilson. In my opinion the payment so made was conditional, and as the acceptances were immediately found to be worthless owing to the insolvency of the buyers, Snowball Company, Limited, were unpaid sellers in the sense of section 44 of the Sale of Goods Act, and were entitled to stop the goods in transitu, and resume possession of them. The acceptances were not those of a third party, but those of the buyers themselves, and they could not have been discounted.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the mere addition of the word "approved" has not the effect of depriving the payment of its conditional character. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has rightly sustained the claim for the sellers, J. B. Snowball Company, Limited.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Warrant to cite Debtor—Objections to sufficiency of vouchers produced—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 26.—A petition for a debtor's sequestration presented without his consent was objected to by the debtor on the ground that the only voucher produced was under suspension.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills sustained the objection and dismissed the petition.

The petitioner having reclaimed, the Court held that the direction in sec. 26 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856,* to grant a warrant to cite the debtor was peremptory, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to grant the usual order and proceed.

Bill-Chamber. 1st Division.

ON 8th September 1904, Miss Isabella Train, residing at Wesley Cottages, Eskbank, near Edinburgh, presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for sequestration of the estate of William Charles Steven, chartered accountant, Edinburgh.

Along with the petition the petitioner produced (1) an extract decree against Steven, dated 28th June 1904, for expenses amounting to £59, 7s. 3d. in name of A. W. Gordon, solicitor, Edinburgh, as agent-disburser; (2) an execution of charge, dated 1st August 1904, proceeding upon said decree; (3) an assignation of said decree and charge by A. W. Gordon in favour of the petitioner, dated 11th August 1904, and bearing to be granted in consideration of the sum of £25 paid to Gordon by the petitioner.

Arrestments having been used in the hands of the debtor against Gordon, the debtor on 30th August 1904 had raised an action of multiplepoinding in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, in which he called the arresters, the present petitioner, and A. W. Gordon. On 7th September 1904 the debtor also brought a suspension of the charge.

A caveat having been lodged by Steven in the sequestration, and parties having been heard thereon, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Stormonth-Darling) on 9th September 1904 pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the voucher produced with the petition is under suspension, dismisses the petition."

The petitioner reclaimed.

The respondent lodged a minute in which he set forth the facts above narrated with regard to the arrestments, and the bringing of the multiplepoinding and the suspension, and also further stated that on 9th September 1904 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in the suspension, on caution, had sisted execution, and on 23d September had passed the note and continued the sist, caution having been found; that ex facie of the taxed account, on which the decree produced with the petition proceeded, £27, 14s. thereof consisted of counsel's and counsel's clerks' fees, which the respondent averred had not been paid,

* The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), enacts, sec. 26—"When a petition for sequestration is presented without the consent of the debtor . . . the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff to whom it is presented shall grant warrant to cite the debtor . . . to appear within a specified period, if he be within Scotland, by delivering to him personally, or by leaving at his dwelling-house or place of business, or the dwelling-house or place of business last occupied by him, a copy of the petition and warrant . . . to shew cause why sequestration should not be awarded; and the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff shall, if desired, grant diligence to recover evidence of the notour bankruptcy or other facts necessary to be established."

and the decree for which was not assignable, Mr Gordon being personally bound to account for them to counsel and their clerks when recovered; that the petitioner had not given any consideration for the assignation of said fees to her, the consideration set forth being £25, and that she was thus not a creditor of the respondent whose debt amounted to not less than £50, as required by section 14 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856;[1] that the respondent was perfectly solvent, and was prepared to pay the amount in the decree to the person or persons having just right thereto; that his intention had been to consign the amount in the decree in the hands of the Sheriff-Clerk as soon as the competency of the multiplepoinding had been sustained, that he had already found caution for the amount in the suspension process, and that he was willing, and offered to consign said amount in the present process if necessary for the affirmance of the interlocutor reclaimed against.

Argued for the reclaimer;—Under section 26 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,[1] the Lord Ordinary had no discretion, and must grant warrant to cite.[2] At that stage the matters alleged by the respondent were irrelevant. They could only be considered and decided on at the later stage, when the debtor had an opportunity under section 30 of shewing cause why the sequestration could not be competently awarded.

Argued for the respondent;—Where the debtor was present, as he was in this case, there was no necessity for a warrant to cite, and if it were instantly shewn that the petition ought to be dismissed that could be done without any warrant to cite being granted. Section 21[3] prescribed the requisites, failing production of which the petition must be dismissed. These requisites were not present here. (1) The petitioner's debt did not amount to £50,[4] in respect that £27, 14s. of the sum in the decree, being counsel's and counsel's clerks' fees unpaid, was not assignable. (2) The voucher was not sufficient, for the charge was under suspension, and a multiplepoinding had been raised. (3) There was no notour bankruptcy. An expired charge was not enough. There must also be insolvency. The presumption of insolvency arising from an expired charge might be rebutted, and was here rebutted by caution being found in the suspension. Satisfaction of the debt had now been made by the offer of consignation, and the petition should be dismissed upon that ground also.[5]

Lord President.—I think the Lord Ordinary has erred here, and that he should have ordered service in the ordinary way. The reason which he gives for not doing so is, that the voucher produced with the petition is under suspension. It is not said that it is bad ex facie, or even that it could be instantly verified to be bad, but merely that it is challenged. It may be on good grounds or without good grounds; and the result of the interlocutor being allowed to stand would be that, while the question of the vouchers is being considered in proceedings quite extrinsic to this petition, the order of service could not be made. It seems to me that if this were to be sustained as a sufficient reason for refusing an order to cite, it would place an impediment in the way of sequestration, with the benefits which it confers in the way of cutting down or preventing the acquisition of preferences, which would be most unfortunate. It seems to me, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary should have granted a warrant to cite the debtor, seeing that there was no instant verification of anything which would be a ground for refusing that order.

LORD ADAM.—I had occasion to express my opinion upon this question in the case of Hope v. Macdougall,[1] and I remain of the opinion, which was the opinion of the Court, that the proper course in such circumstances as were present here was to pronounce an order for service.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I think the procedure prescribed by the statute is peremptory. It may turn out that this petition for sequestration is not competent or not sufficiently supported, but meantime the statutory course must be followed. It may be that if the petitioning creditor fails to produce any account or vouchers, as required by the 21st section, the petition may be dismissed de plano. But if a question arises as to the sufficiency of vouchers actually produced, it cannot be decided or considered until after citation.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to grant the usual order of citation and to proceed.

Except for a provision of £10,000 for the endowment of one of the two churches, the trust-disposition and settlement contained no provision for endowment. Upon the completion of the buildings the trustees were directed to convey them, on certain specified conditions, to trustees to be appointed respectively by the Bishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese in which the churches were to be situated.

stated they were unable to accept the bequests under the conditions specified, on the ground that owing to want of endowment the conditions could not be implemented. They proposed that the testamentary trustees should either accumulate the funds till they amounted to a sum sufficient to build and endow the churches, or that the fund should be applied in accordance with a scheme to be approved by the Court.

Held that either proposal was contrary to the truster's intention, and that the bequests having lapsed owing to the refusal of the Bishops to accept them on the conditions specified by the testator the sums in question fell into residue.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

JOHN PATRICK CRICHTON, third Marquess of Bute, died on 9th October 1900, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 13th July 1894.

By the trust-disposition and settlement the Marquess, inter alia, bequeathed, "to such trustees as may be named for the purpose by the Right Reverend George John Smith, Roman Catholic Bishop of Argyll, whom failing, by his successor in that office for the time, a sum of £10,000, the income of said sum to be applied by them for the upkeep of daily Roman Catholic Cathedral service at Oban in the church to be built there by my trustees, or elsewhere in Oban: . . . To my trustees the sum of £40,000 . . . for the purpose of erecting and completing by themselves, or in conjunction with others, according to plans to be approved of by my trustees, a Roman Catholic church at Oban and a Roman Catholic church or monastery at Whithorn (the said church at Oban and church or monastery at Whithorn to be built by my trustees at the said places in the order in which they are above named, and that at a cost to my trustees of not more than £20,000 for said church at Oban, and £20,000 for said church or monastery at Whithorn, but my trustees shall not expend in these erections or either of them more than £10,000 in any one year . . .): And in the event of my having given the whole or part of the cost of erecting and completing either or both of the said church and church or monastery, and the same having been completed during my life, the sum or sums so given by me shall be held to be payment in full of the legacy hereby bequeathed for the purpose of completing said church and said church or monastery, and in the event of such church and church or monastery having been commenced but not completed during my life, any sum or sums given or paid by me towards the erection of such church or church or monastery shall be held to be payment pro tanto of the sum or sums hereby bequeathed towards such erection, and my trustees shall pay the balance only of such sum or sums or such smaller sum or sums as may be necessary to complete such church or church or monastery, my intention being merely to have such church and church or monastery completed, although it may be at a less cost than £20,000 each: And when each of the said church and church or monastery has been completed, my trustees shall denude thereof in favour of my widow, whom failing, one of my descendants (one of whom when practicable shall always be selected to act as trustee by the remaining trustees), and such other trustees, not exceeding four in number, as may be named or appointed for the purpose by the Roman Catholic Bishop officiating in the respective districts for the time, and which four other trustees shall be laymen, with the exception of the Bishop himself, who may be one of said trustees, and one of them shall be a lawyer; and said trustees shall, as a condition of receiving a conveyance of said church and church or monastery, be bound to undertake to free and relieve my trustees and my trust-estate of all future liability concerning the same, and my said trustees shall, before denuding of said church and church or monastery in favour of the trustees to be named or appointed as aforesaid, either exact from said Bishop a formal and sufficient deed, renouncing for himself and his successors in office, as an inherent condition of his and their trusteeship, all or any immunity which he or they as a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic may in any way have or claim from civil proceedings against him or them as trustee or trustees, or otherwise, as they may be advised by counsel learned in the law, shall in denuding of the said church and church or monastery, or either of them, make it an effectual inherent condition of the trust that such immunity shall not be pleadable by any trustee, whether a Roman Catholic Bishop or not."

The trust-disposition then provided:—"And further, my said trustees, in denuding of said church and church or monastery, or either of them, shall make it a condition of the conveyance thereof—(First) That each of the said churches shall be free and open, and that no charge for admission to or for presence in the building or any part of it, or for seats therein, shall be made on any occasion whatever: (Second) That each of said edifices shall be consecrated within eight days of the date on which it may be handed over to the new trustees, and that the whole of what is called 'The Divine Office' shall be publicly said or sung there every day, and other daily or occasional services shall be conducted as directed by the Rubrics: And I further direct that in the event of my trustees joining with other subscribers in erecting any one of the churches at the places above named, they must make it a prior condition of their doing so that the conditions hereinbefore enjoined with reference (first) to the non-immunity of the Roman Catholic Bishop from civil proceedings as trustee; (second) the churches being free and open; (third) the consecration of the edifice; and (fourth) 'The Divine Office,' shall form an inherent part of the constitution of the church: And I hereby declare that in the event of the trustees who may be named in terms of the powers hereby conferred for carrying out the purposes of the trust to be constituted with reference to the said church at Oban, and the said church or monastery at Whithorn, declining to undertake the trust subject to the several conditions herein specified, or failing to carry out the said several conditions, the trusts in their favour, and such portion of the legacies as may remain unexpended, shall lapse so far as such trustees are concerned, and the edifices and balance of the legacies shall revert to my trustees, in order that they may give effect to my intentions as above indicated; and in the event of my trustees finding it unnecessary to expend the whole of said sums of £20,000 for each of said church at Oban and church or monastery at Whithorn, either by reason of payments made by me during my life, or by reason of money being available for the purpose from other sources, so that the full sums of £20,000 shall not be required to complete the said erections respectively, the balance unexpended by them shall revert to the residue of my estate."

In November 1903 the trustees named in the trust-disposition and settlement brought an action of multiplepoinding for the determination of questions that had arisen upon the foregoing provisions, the fund in medio being the sum of £40,000 mentioned therein.

Nov. 16, 1904. Marquess of Bute's Trustees v. Marquess of Bute.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Argyll lodged a condescendence and claim in which he stated:—"2. The funds at the claimant's disposal are not such that it is certain that in all time coming the condition imposed by the truster, that 'The Divine Office' shall be publicly said or sung every day, could be fulfilled. It might therefore happen that, through inability to do this the church, which had then been consecrated, would in terms of the trust-deed revert to the trustees. The claimant cannot accept of the bequest on this condition. Further, funds at the claimant's disposal are not such as to enable him to maintain the fabric of the church. 3. The claimant therefore maintains that the real raisers ought to hold the said £20,000, and accumulate the interest thereof until the income has accumulated so as to form an endowment fund for the maintenance of the fabric and the performance of 'The Divine Office,' or otherwise to submit a scheme modifying the testator's intentions in certain respects, so as, as far as possible, with the said sum, to carry out the essential intention of the truster."

The claimant therefore claimed that the trustees should either (1) accumulate the said sum, or (2) prepare the scheme referred to.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Galloway also lodged a condescendence and claim, in which he made averments in greater detail as to the impossibility of carrying into effect the bequests as they stood looking to the law of the Roman Catholic Church, and suggested alternative schemes for carrying into effect what he maintained to be the essential purposes of the testator.

The testamentary trustees lodged a condescendence and claim to substantially the same effect as those of the bishops.

The Marquess of Bute, the heir and residuary legatee of the testator, lodged a condescendence and claim, in which he stated:—"2. The claimant maintains that, on a sound construction of the said trust-disposition and settlement, the trustees have no power to accumulate the income of the said two sums of £20,000, and £20,000 in order to form an endowment fund, the testator having expressly provided that any balance of said sums unexpended on building shall revert to the residue of the estate. He further maintains that the beneficiaries under the deed having declined to accept the said sums on the conditions on which they were bequeathed, the bequests have lapsed, and fall to be dealt with as part of the residue of the estate. With reference to the averments by the other claimants, that, under the circumstances, the Court should approve of a scheme to give effect cy-près to what they maintain to have been the testator's intention, the claimant denies that there has been any change of circumstances since the testator's death to justify such a course being adopted, and, further, maintains that the doctrine of cy-près cannot competently be given effect to in the present process. He therefore, as residuary legatee of the late Marquess of Bute, claims to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio."

On 20th May 1904, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the claim of the claimant the Marquess of Bute contains no averment, and that nothing appears upon record, relevant in existing circumstances to infer a lapse to the said claimant as residuary legatee of the two bequests of £20,000 each now in question; therefore repels in hoc statu the claim for the Marquess of Bute, and decerns: Finds, however, it is alleged, and not disputed, that there is at least a prospect that if the churches and monastery in question shall be built by the pursuers and real raisers as directed by the trust-settlement, the same may not be accepted by the trustees to whom they are directed to be handed over unless provision shall be at the same time made for the upkeep of the fabrics and the maintenance of religious services therein: Finds that in these circumstances the claimants other than the Marquess of Bute desire to have an opportunity of submitting to the Court a scheme or schemes for applying part of the said two bequests of £20,000 each to the said subsidiary purposes: Therefore, before answer, allows the said claimants to lodge quam primum such scheme or schemes as they propose, with a view to their being reported to the Court: Quoad ultra continues the cause."

Leave to reclaim having been granted, the Marquess reclaimed.

The nature of the arguments sufficiently appears from the contentions above set forth, and from the opinions of the Court.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am unable to agree with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, as my view is that the claimant the Marquess of Bute is entitled to judgment. The bequest of the late Marquess which is in dispute is quite clear in its terms, that his trustees are authorised and directed to provide church buildings at Whithorn and at Oban, at an expense of not more than £20,000 at each place, it being further expressed as his intention that if on the buildings being completed the whole sum of £20,000 has not been expended, the remainder is to revert to his estate, his "intention being merely" to have the buildings completed, although "at a less cost than £20,000."

He affixed to the bequest the conditions that a conveyance of the buildings to trustees was not to be given by his testamentary trustees except upon certain conditions, two of which were that the buildings should be consecrated within eight days, and that the "Divine Office" should be said or sung in the building every day.

The ecclesiastical authorities by whom these conditions could alone be carried out, viz., the Roman Catholic Bishops in Argyll and Galloway, state their inability to fulfil either of these conditions if the buildings are erected in terms of the bequest, because of the want of any endowment by which the conditions could be fulfilled.

The trustees accordingly have not proceeded with the erection of the buildings, and propose, with the acquiescence of the Bishops, to hold the funds so that by accumulation they may increase and thus provide for endowment as well as building.

I can find no authority for this being done. The late Marquess nowhere indicates that his estate is to provide any endowment, except one which he specifies, viz., £10,000 for the Oban Cathedral which he intended to be built. It seems to me to be very plain that he did not intend to provide any other endowment, and that to keep up the money he left to raise an endowment fund would be to do what he has given no authority for doing.

Thus his purpose in the bequest for building has failed, as the circumstances are such that those to whom it would fall to consecrate the buildings and to carry on the services decline on the ground of inability to undertake that these conditions of the gift shall be fulfilled.

I feel constrained, therefore, to hold that the sums bequeathed fall back into the estate of the late Marquess, to be dealt with as the residue is required to be dealt with, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled and the claim of the present Marquess sustained.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The late Marquess of Bute directed his trustees to expend a sum of £40,000, or so much of that sum as might be found necessary, on the erection of two churches, one at Oban and the other at Whithorn. When completed these churches were to be conveyed to certain trustees to be nominated by the Roman Catholic Bishops for the time in Argyll and Galloway respectively. The churches, however, were only to be conveyed to the trustees so nominated on certain conditions, which are very clearly stated—about them there is, and can be in my opinion, no dubiety. I need not repeat here what the conditions are. It is enough to say that both the Roman Catholic Bishop of Argyll and the Roman Catholic Bishop of Galloway state in their claims that they cannot accept the legacy—that is, a conveyance of the churches—on the conditions specified. That, in my view, is conclusive of their respective claims. The trustees of the late Marquess have no authority or right to build the churches, and would act unreasonably in doing so if they are certiorated that the churches when completed would not be accepted by the donees on the conditions on which alone they could take the benefit of the donation or legacy. One of the grounds on which the legacy is declined is that there would be no funds for maintaining the churches and the celebration of divine service therein. In aid of the reverend claimants the trustees (of the late Marquess) propose that they should be authorised to retain the £40,000 in their hands and accumulate the same with the interest thereon until the fund amounted to a sum sufficient to build the churches and also to endow them. I think this not only not authorised by the truster's settlement but directly opposed to his intention. The truster contemplated that by public subscription or otherwise the churches might be completed without the expenditure of the whole £40,000, and except the sum of £10,000 specially bequeathed for the maintenance of divine service in the church at Oban he neither gave nor intended to give any sum whatever towards endowment. His words are, "My intention being merely to have such church and church or monastery completed, although it may be at a less cost than £20,000 each." I gather it to have been the meaning and intention of the truster that he would provide the churches, but looked to his co-religionists to maintain them and the services therein. The proposal, therefore, of the trustees to accumulate funds for the purpose of endowment is not in accordance with any direction given to them, but contrary to the truster's wish and intention. What, then, is to come of the £40,000? This also is, I think, provided for. The truster directs that if his trustees find it "unnecessary to expend the whole" of the £40,000 "the balance unexpended by them shall revert to the residue of my estate." As it has turned out, it is not "necessary" for the trustees to expend any part of the £40,000, and therefore the whole of it (although the truster only anticipated a balance) in my opinion reverts to residue. The result, in my opinion, is that the claim of the Marquess of Bute (the residuary legatee) should be sustained to the whole fund in medio and the other claims repelled.

Police—Street—Building Regulations—Width of street—Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. cl.), sec. 20.—Section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, enacts,—"The Dean of Guild shall not, without the consent of the Corporation, grant decree for the erection or re-erection of any building upon ground adjoining any street unless on the condition that one-half of the width of such street, measuring such half from the centre of such street towards such ground, shall be cleared of all structures, if any, existing thereon, and shall . . . be wholly dedicated to the public for street purposes . . . ON 22d March 1904 Thomas M'Dougall, builder, 41 Circus Drive, Dennistoun, Glasgow, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow, for a lining and warrant to erect tenements of dwelling-houses and shops on ground belonging to him fronting Springburn Road, Glasgow. Prior to 1891 Springburn Road was a turnpike road 40 feet in width, outside Glasgow, but by the City of Glasgow Act, 1891, the road was included within the city boundaries, and became one of the public streets of the city.

On 19th April 1904 the Master of Works reported that having heard parties and "having due regard to (1) the history and character of Springburn Road, which was a turnpike road, and is also a public street of the city; (2) the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, section 366,* and the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, section 20; and (3) the width of the street where tenements or permanent buildings have been already erected," he fixed the width of Springburn Road at the part in question at 60 feet, and on a plan prepared by him defined the position of the centre of said street by marking thereon a red line.

On 26th April 1904 the petitioner appealed to the Dean of Guild against the determination of the Master of Works. The contentions of the parties, as stated in the petitioner's note of objections, and the answers thereto of the Master of Works, are fully set forth in the opinion of the Lord President.

On 9th June 1904 the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuses the appeal, and sustains the determination of the Master of Works contained in the said report and plan; fixes the width of Springburn Road at the part in question at 60 feet; defines the centre of the said road to be along the red ink line marked on the said plan . . . and continues the cause."†

And the position of the centre of any such street shall be defined by the Master of Works with reference to any application which may be made to the Dean of Guild for a lining to erect or re-erect any such building."

† "NOTE.—(After narrating the facts)—It can scarcely be maintained that the Act of 1900 made the provision it did in section 21, if all that the Master of Works could do under section 20 was to measure with a tape the de facto width of public streets. In the Dean's judgment the Master of Works was entitled and bound to apply his mind to the whole circumstances and fix what he thought was the proper width. That being so, the Dean has considered the reasons assigned by the Master of Works for his determination of the width of this road at 60 feet, and he sees no reason to alter that determination. . . ."

M'Dongall v. Nisbet.

Against this interlocutor the petitioner appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The lining asked for was 30 feet from the centre of Springburn Road, and complied with the provisions of section 366 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866,* and this was all the Dean of Guild was entitled to ask for. The fact that the buildings were to be erected 10 feet from the existing boundary of the road, did not dedicate the intervening space to the public for street purposes. Springburn Road prior to its inclusion within the city boundaries by the City of Glasgow Act, 1891, was a rural turnpike road, with a well-defined width between stone walls of 40 feet, and that was its width when this petition was presented. The Corporation had not yet issued the register of streets provided for by section 9, subsection (2), of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900.† Had they done so, the actual breadth—viz., 40 feet—of Springburn Road would have been entered on the register. The duty imposed upon the Master of Works by section 20 of the Act of 1900 was to fix the width of the street as actually existing. He was not entitled to add to its width by appropriating private property. If it was thought necessary to widen the street, the necessary ground could be acquired by the Corporation at the public expense under the provisions of section 300 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, or section 25 of the Act of 1900.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The Dean of Guild could not grant a lining except in conformity with the provisions of section 20 of the Act of 1900, and until an application for a lining was presented there was no occasion to fix the width of the street. The plain meaning of section 20 was that the Master of Works should fix the width of the street with a view to existing and future possibilities of traffic. It did not mean that he should merely measure the existing street. It was not necessary for the Corporation to acquire the extra ground, but it must be cleared of existing structures and dedicated to the public for street purposes.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether a judgment of the Dean of Guild of Glasgow, by which he fixed the width of Springburn Road, Glasgow, ex adverso of property belonging to the appellant, at 60 feet, and defined the centre of that road to be along a red ink line marked upon a plan produced, is right.

The proceedings originated in a petition by the appellant, lodged in the Dean of Guild Court, on 22d March 1904, for authority to erect certain buildings on the property belonging to him fronting Springburn Road. Upon this petition the Dean of Guild, on 31st March 1904, pronounced an interlocutor by which he, ante omnia, remitted to the Master of Works to hear parties, and thereafter to fix the width, and define the position of the centre, of Springburn Road ex adverso of the petitioner's property specified in the petition, all in terms of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900.

By that section it is declared that the Dean of Guild shall not, without the consent of the Corporation, grant decree for the erection or re-erection of any building upon ground adjoining any street, unless on the condition that one-half of the width of such street, measuring such half from the centre of such street, towards such ground, shall be cleared of all structures, if any, existing thereon, and shall, subject to the provisions of the Police Acts, be wholly dedicated to the public for street purposes, and that this condition shall be presumed to be made by the Dean of Guild in every decree granted by him.

It is further declared by section 20 that, for the purposes of it, the width of a public street shall be the width set forth in the register, where such width is entered therein, and that the width of any public street of which the dimensions are not set forth in the register, and of any private street of which the dimensions are not specified or shewn as thereinbefore mentioned, shall be fixed by the Master of Works. The section further provides that the position of the centre of any such street shall be defined by the Master of Works with reference to any application which may be made to the Dean of Guild for a lining to erect, or re-erect, any such building as therein mentioned.

On 19th April 1904 the Master of Works, in execution of the remit thus made to him, reported to the Court that, having heard parties, and having due regard to, (1) the history and character of Springburn Road, which was a turnpike road, and was also a public street of the city, (2) the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, section 366, and the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, section 20, and (3) the width of the street where tenements or permanent buildings had already been erected, he fixed the width of Springburn Road at the place in question at 60 feet, and on a plan prepared by him as relative thereto, he defined the position of the centre of the street by marking thereon a red line on which there are marked the words "Centre line of road," that line being situated midway between the old walls on each side of the road. The appellant alleges that the width of the road at the place in question was previously only forty feet.

The appellant, deeming himself aggrieved by the determination of the Master of Works, appealed to the Dean of Guild against it, and craved to be heard in support of his appeal. In particular he maintained that the purposes of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, viz., that the streets should be cleared of structures, and dedicated to street purposes, having been fulfilled, he (the appellant) did not desire to propose any interference with it, except the temporary interference incident to his building, and proposed that his building line should be 30 feet from the centre of the street in terms of section 366 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, which declares that the Dean of Guild shall not grant a warrant to erect any building, except a stone wall not exceeding 6 feet in height within 20 feet of the centre of any portion of a statute-labour road within the city, or within 30 feet of the centre of any turnpike road within the city which is relinquished by the trustees thereof, and is assumed by the Magistrates and Council as a public street under the powers of this Act, unless the said building could have been erected within a less distance of the centre of such turnpike road without contravention of the Acts relating to the said road. To this the Master of Works replied that the purposes of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, had not been fulfilled, and that the fixing of the width of the street was necessary, and I think that this reply was well founded. The appellant complained that the Master of Works had erroneously assumed that by the removal of the building line to 30 feet from the centre of the street, he could extend the width of the street to the same line, thus attempting to appropriate for street purposes, and to subject to the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, 10 feet of ground belonging to the appellant, which he alleges was truly subject only to the restriction imposed by section 366 of that Act prohibiting buildings thereon exceeding 6 feet in height. He maintained that the power claimed by the Master of Works was not warranted by section 20 of the Act of 1900, or by any other enactment of law, and he pleaded that if the Master of Works considered that it would be to the public advantage to have the street widened, his proper course was to proceed under section 300 of the Act of 1866, and purchase the additional ground which he desired on behalf of the Magistrates and Council, or under section 25 of the Act of 1900, which provides that in order to secure as far as possible a regular line and satisfactory width and level for the footpaths in every street, the Corporation may, after notice by the Master of Works to the person responsible for the maintenance of such footpath, or the part thereof affected, alter the line and level of the footpath, increase or lessen the width thereof, and carry out such other operations thereon as may be necessary or desirable for the improvement of the footpath or street, and thereafter such footpath, when so altered or widened, shall be subject to the provisions of the Police Acts. The Master of Works alleged that other tenements besides those of the appellant had been erected since 1891 in Springburn Road, within the portion added to the city in 1891, that these tenements were 30 feet from the centre of the road, and that the width of the street there was in fact 60 feet. It appears to me that the position taken up by the Master of Works, and sustained by the Dean of Guild is well founded, and in particular I think that the city did not require, in order to effect the widening of the Springburn Road at the place in question, to purchase, or take under compulsory powers, any of the land belonging to the appellant.

On 9th June 1904 the Dean of Guild having considered the pleadings, documents, and plans lodged, refused the appeal, and sustained the determination of the Master of Works contained in the report and plan mentioned, fixed the width of Springburn Road at the part in question at 60 feet, and defined the centre of the road to be along the red ink line marked on the plan.

In a note to his interlocutor the Dean of Guild says that the building of the appellant's proposed tenements was not placed on the line of an old boundary wall mentioned in the pleadings, but 10 feet further back, and this was done to meet the requirements of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, section 366, which declares that the Dean shall not grant a warrant to erect any building within 30 feet of the centre of any portion of a turnpike road within the city, that this keeping back of the building line left a strip of ground of 10 feet between the old boundary wall and the new building line, and that the dispute between the parties was ultimately limited to this strip of 10 feet,—that the Master of Works having fixed the width at 60 feet, his determination was brought under review of the Dean of Guild under section 21 of the Act of 1900, and that he (the Dean), in accordance with the determination which he had made in a previous case, decided that the Master of Works was right.

No. 12.

Nov. 17, 1904. M'Dougall v. Nisbet.

I am of opinion that the conclusion thus arrived at by the Dean of Guild is correct. I concur with him in thinking that, keeping in view the terms of section 21 of the Act of 1900, the Master of Works was entitled, and bound, to apply his mind to the whole circumstances of the case, and to fix what he, in view of these, considered to be the proper width. I also concur with the Dean of Guild in thinking that, for the reasons assigned by the Master of Works, he rightly determined the width of the road in question at 60 feet, and accordingly that his decision to that effect should be upheld.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. This case and the one which follows it raise the same question though in different forms; it is a question on the construction of the Glasgow Buildings Act.

Now, the effect of this Act seems to be, first, that the local authorities when a new building is proposed to be put up, may fix the width of the street to be anything they please, and may then make it a condition of the building order that nothing shall be erected on the space which has been thrown into the street for the purpose of increasing its width. I confess I see nothing in this legislation that calls for special construction. The provision of the Act of Parliament is perfectly plain, that the Master of Works (who, as I consider, is merely a servant of the Corporation) is to provisionally fix—subject, of course, to the review of the Dean of Guild—the width of the street. That cannot mean merely measuring the existing street; it must mean determining what is to be for future and practical purposes the width of the projected street. It has been represented to us that this is a hardship on proprietors; but, after all, the Corporation is only doing for the proprietor whose property adjoins the street what every sensible proprietor who lays out his land for feuing would do for himself—that is, making roads and passages of sufficient width for the accommodation of tenants and passengers. That being settled, I do not think the facts of the case present any difficulty. I agree with your Lordship that, the width of the street being fixed in accordance with the statutory requirements, whenever an owner adjacent to the street comes for an order requiring the sanction of the Dean of Guild he is entitled to require that the ground thrown into the street shall be cleared of building and levelled, and then the street is to be available for purposes of traffic.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

adjoining a public street in Glasgow obtained a lining in the Dean of Guild Court for certain buildings upon a plan which shewed that they were to be erected at a distance of 30 feet from the centre of the street in compliance with section 366 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. At the time the lining was granted the actual width of one-half of the street at the place in question was 20 feet, and no steps had been taken to fix the width of the street in terms of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900. After the buildings had been erected a statutory notice at the instance of the Master of Works was served upon the proprietor, calling upon him to lay a foot-pavement on the space of 10 feet intervening between the buildings and the original boundary of the street, and in the course of the proceedings to enforce the notice in the Dean of Guild Court, the width of one-half of the street was fixed at 30 feet under the provisions of section 20 of the Act of 1900.

Held (1) that in view of the provisions of section 20 of the Act of 1900 it must be presumed that the lining was granted on condition that one-half of the street, measuring from the centre of the street towards the buildings, should be cleared of all structures and dedicated to the public for street purposes, and (2) that the proprietor was bound to form the foot-pavement in front of the buildings.

Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow.

ON 1st November 1900 Thomas M'Dougall obtained a lining from the Dean of Guild for the erection of certain buildings on part of his ground fronting Springburn Road, Glasgow. The plans shewed that the buildings were to be erected at a distance of 30 feet from the centre of the road, in compliance with the provisions of section 366 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.* At the time the lining was granted the boundary of Mr M'Dougall's property was a low wall 20 feet from the centre of Springburn Road, so that there was a space of 10 feet between the wall and the proposed buildings. The plans shewed that this space of 10 feet was to be formed into a footpath, the kerb being in the line of the wall, and in fact before the buildings were erected the wall was cleared away, and the 10 feet of ground was left unenclosed and open to foot-passengers. At the time the lining was granted no steps had been taken to fix the width of Springburn Road in terms of sections 20 and 21 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900.†

Before October 1902 R. B. Wilson & Company, 24 St Enoch Square, Glasgow, and John Howie, 52 Cowlairs Road, Glasgow, became the proprietors of the buildings erected under the lining granted to Mr M'Dougall in 1900.

On 7th October 1902 George Neilson, Procurator-fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court, in which he stated that notices had been served in terms of section 317 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, upon R. B. Wilson & Company and John Howie, representing Thomas M'Dougall, as proprietors of lands and heritages in Springburn Road, requiring them, within ten days thereafter, to form a foot-pavement to a width of 10 feet from their building lines in accordance with a certain specification; that the defenders had lodged written objections to the requisition; and that the cost of the work would, in the opinion of the Master of Works, exceed £5. The petitioner therefore prayed the Dean of Guild Court to decide the question raised as to the reasonableness and necessity of the work, and the liability of the defenders for the cost thereof.

Neilson v. R. B. Wilson & Co.

The defenders stated in their objections that Springburn Road was 40 feet wide, including a footpath 7 feet wide on the side next their buildings; that the intervening strip of 10 feet next their buildings formed no part of the road, but was their private property, which they were entitled to fence off; that the Master of Works and the road authority were not entitled to cause the said 10 feet strip to be formed into a footpath till the road authority had acquired it for the purpose of widening the road under the powers conferred by section 299 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866; and that the existing footpath of 7 feet was an inseparable part of the public street, which the road authority were bound to maintain. The defenders, however, stated that they and Mr M'Dougall were willing to allow the 10 feet strip of ground next their buildings to be devoted to the public use without payment, and to permit the existing footpath of 7 feet to be thrown into the carriageway, on condition that the road authority formed the 10 feet strip into a foot-pavement at their own expense, and took it over as part of the public street.

On 25th February 1903, the Dean of Guild, ante omnia, remitted to the Master of Works to fix the width of Springburn Road in terms of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900.

On 27th March 1903, the Master of Works reported that having heard parties and "having due regard to (1) the history and character of Springburn Road, which was a turnpike road and is also a public street of the city; (2) the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, section 366, and the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, section 20; and (3) the width of the street between tenements or permanent buildings where such have been already erected," he fixed the width of Springburn Road at the part in question at 60 feet, and on a plan prepared by him defined the position of the centre of the street by marking thereon a red line.

The defenders appealed to the Dean of Guild against this determination, and on 20th February 1904, the Dean of Guild refused the appeal, sustained the determination of the Master of Works, and fixed the width of Springburn Road in terms thereof.

On 20th February 1904, the Dean of Guild pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found, inter alia, that the paving work specified in the petition was necessary and reasonable, and ordained the defenders to execute the same.*

* "NOTE.— . . . Mr M'Dougall's position is that the piece of ground in question is not a footpath, that it could yet be fenced in by him by his placing a wall or other structure on the position of the old wall now removed, and that accordingly he cannot be asked to form this ground into pavement or throw it into the public street without compensation.

"In terms of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, it must now be presumed that in the lining referred to the following condition was made, viz., that one-half of the width of such street, measuring such half from the centre of such street towards such ground, shall be cleared of all structures and wholly dedicated to the public for street purposes. If that be so, the Dean of Guild thinks that the strip of ground in question has been dedicated for street purposes, and cannot now be enclosed by Mr M'Dougall.

"It is said by the respondent that the width referred to in this condition is to be measured from the centre towards the ground; that the section provides how the centre and the width are to be ascertained; that the centre can in terms of the section be defined by the Master of Works only

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

In addition to the argument submitted in the case of M'Dougall v. Nisbet, supra, p. 57, the appellants argued;—There was here no application for a lining. The petition was presented under the powers conferred by section 317 and following sections of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, and a remit to the Master of Works to fix the width of a public street in such a proceeding was incompetent. The powers of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, could only be invoked when a petition for a lining had been presented.

The respondent, in addition to the argument submitted in the case of M'Dougall v. Nisbet, supra, p. 57, argued;—The decree of lining was got on certain conditions as shewn by the plans, and these conditions could not now be departed from.[1] with reference to any application for lining; that as this process is not an application for lining no determination of the Master of Works can be applied here; and that there being no defined centre, the section does not apply.

"The Dean of Guild does not think it is necessary to decide whether the width or the centre of the street can be defined only with reference to an application for lining, or whether the limitation applies only to the fixing by the Master of Works of the centre. The view he takes does not involve the application of any determination by the Master of Works. In its main enactment the section provides that one-half of the width of such street, measuring such half from the centre towards the building, is to be cleared and dedicated to the public, and the Dean finds in Mr M'Dougall's own plans and in his pleadings in the present proceedings sufficient data for finding the centre and the width of Springburn Road at the part in question; and Mr M'Dougall's ideas on these points fortunately coincide with the determination of the Master of Works.

"Even assuming that Mr M'Dougall's contention as to the width and centre being defined only with reference to an application for lining is a sound one, the Dean of Guild cannot help feeling that the plans submitted by Mr M'Dougall were capable of only one reading, which was that no question was to be raised about the strip of ground between the then existing wall and the building-line. The Dean has no doubt that if there had been any suggestion on the face of the plans that the ground in question was to form the subject of a claim on the part of Mr M'Dougall, the Court would in that application for lining have invoked the provisions of section 20, and had the width and centre defined with reference to that application for lining. But, as the Dean has said, he does not need to consider any argument as to the machinery given by section 20 for finding the width. Mr M'Dougall has himself fixed the width and centre, and by the Act one-half of the width of such street ex adverso of Mr M'Dougall's property is wholly dedicated to the public for street purposes. An attempt was made to read the word 'street' as roadway exclusive of footpath, but such a construction is out of the question.

"If the Dean is right in the view he takes, then little remains to be said on the merits of the present action. The ground as it presently stands is not in a proper state for a footpath, and there is no doubt as to the reasonableness of the requirements of the Master of Works for the repair or formastates that when Mr M'Dougall applied for and obtained a decree of lining relative to the part of Springburn Road in question, the plans submitted and passed shewed that he had in view, and was giving effect to, the requirements of the Turnpike Act by placing the building for the erection of which authority was sought thirty feet from the centre of Springburn Road, and that no indication was given that Mr M'Dougall intended to retain a small wall of about five feet in height, which formed the boundary of his ground along Springburn Road, or that he intended to enclose the piece of ground between that wall and the new building line. He states that in point of fact the wall was cleared away, and that the piece of ground had not been enclosed, but had been left open to foot-passengers since Mr M'Dougall's building was put up. He further states that the Master of Works had called upon Mr M'Dougall to repair the ground thus used as a footpath, or to form it into a proper footpath, but that Mr M'Dougall denied that it was a footpath, and maintained that it could yet be fenced in by him by his placing a wall or other structure on the position of the old wall now removed, and that accordingly he is not bound to allow it to be added to the public street without receiving compensation. The Dean of Guild says that in view of the provisions of section 20 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, it must in his judgment be presumed that, in the lining referred to, the condition was made that one-half of the width of the street, measuring from the centre of the street towards the ground, should be cleared of buildings and dedicated entirely to the public for street purposes, and I concur with him in this view, and also in thinking that a strip of ground in question has been dedicated for such purposes, and cannot now be enclosed by Mr M'Dougall. The width and centre of the road have been duly fixed, and under the Act one-half of the width ex adverso of Mr M'Dougall's property has become wholly dedicated to the public for street purposes. It seems to be clear that the ground as it was at the commencement of these proceedings, was not in a condition proper for a footpath, that the requirements of the Master of Works for the repair and formation of the footpath were reasonable, and that the proprietors whose lands adjoined, or have a right of access by the street, are liable for this repair. As the cost of the works required to be executed exceeded, in the opinion of the Master of Works, the sum of £5, the Dean of Guild acted properly in granting the order craved by the Procurator-fiscal.

I may refer to my opinion given to-day in the case of M'Dougall v. Nisbet,[1] for a further examination of the statutory provisions applicable to the case.

Reparation—Slander—Foreign—Lex loci delicti—Publication of Slander.—In order to maintain an action ex delicto in Scotland, when the wrong is committed in another country, the wrong must be one for which an action can be maintained both by the law of Scotland and by the law of the country in which it is said to have been done.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a firm in England against a firm in Scotland, the pursuers averred that the slander was contained in two letters and a telegram, sent from Scotland, by the defenders to the pursuers, and that the slander had been published in the sense of English law, in respect that the letters had been dictated to and typewritten by the defenders' clerks, and that the telegram had passed through the hands of post-office clerks. The names of the defenders' clerks and of the post-office clerks were not given.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) dismissed the action, holding (1) that there was no relevant averment of publication of defamatory matter to persons other than the pursuers; (2) that the defamatory statement to the pursuers was made in England; (3) that it was admitted that by the law of England the statement to the pursuers themselves was not an injury to reputation and was not an actionable wrong; and (4) that the action could not be maintained in respect that the statement was not an actionable wrong by the law of England.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

ON 13th January 1904 Joseph Evans & Sons, engineers, Wolverhampton, raised an action against John G. Stein & Company, Ganister and Fireclay Works, Bonnybridge, concluding for £1000 damages for slander.

The pursuers averred that the slander complained of was contained in two letters and a telegram dispatched through the post-office and delivered to the pursuers at Wolverhampton, complaining of delay in forwarding certain pumping plant. (Cond. 10) The statements in the letters and telegram were falsely and maliciously made, and without probable cause or any cause. "The question whether the letters and telegram are actionable falls to be determined according to the law and practice of Scotland. . . . The letters complained of were dictated by the defenders to, and typewritten by, a clerk or clerks in the employment of the defenders in Scotland. The letters and telegram of the defenders, dated 18th and 19th June 1903, addressed to the pursuers were in the ordinary course of the business opened by, and read by, members of the staff of pursuers' firm on delivery at the pursuers' place of business. None of said letters or telegram were in fact opened by, or read by, partners of the pursuers' firm in the first instance. All the said letters and telegram were thus published to third parties, in the sense of English law, both in Scotland and in England. The said telegram, dispatched by the defenders on 18th June 1903, passed through the hands of clerks in telegraph offices as an open message both on its dispatch from Scotland and on its arrival in England, and was thus published to third parties in both countries in the sense of English law."

The defenders averred;—(Ans. 10) " . . . The pursuers carry on business in England, and the letters complained of were addressed and delivered to the pursuers at their place of business in Wolverhampton. Said letters were not published in Scotland, and the question whether or not the contents of said letters are libellous falls to be determined according to English law and practice. By the law of England, in order to constitute a libel it is necessary for the alleged libellous writing to be published to a third party, and the dispatch by the defenders to the pursuers of said letters was not publication in the sense of English law. . . . ."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having slandered the pursuers as condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to reparation as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No relevant case.

On 21st June 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced an interlocutor approving of certain issues and counter issues for the trial of the cause.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action of damages for defamation. The pursuers, Evans & Sons, carry on business in England, and the defenders, Stein & Company, in Scotland. The libel is said to be contained in certain letters and a telegram passing from the defenders in Scotland to the pursuers in England.

"I think the letters are undoubtedly slanderous, and I am of opinion that the issue proposed fairly enough expresses their meaning.

"But the defenders stated at the debate an argument of considerable importance and difficulty, contending that the pursuers were not entitled to any issue. Their argument was that the action was founded on a delict committed in England, and that therefore the pursuers' right depended on the law of England, that, according to the law of England, there could be no libel unless the alleged libellous writings had been published to a third party; and they aver that the dispatch 'by the defenders to the pursuers of the said letters was not publication in the sense of English law.' They do not aver on record that the telegram was not published. They argued that the pursuers were not entitled to any issue. But I do not think that the defenders have stated any pleas which can cover that argument, and I could not have given effect to it without an amendment of the record. But, although the argument was ingeniously and forcibly stated, I am not prepared to assent to it. In the first place I am not convinced that the case should be determined by the law of England. I think it should be determined by the law of Scotland. The defenders maintained that the place where the letters and telegram were delivered to the pursuers was the locus delicti, and that the law applicable was the lex loci delicti. They founded chiefly on Kendrick v. Burnett, 1897, 25 R. 82, and Goodman v. Barnet, 14 S. L. R. 449. These were cases of injuries inflicted or suffered either on the high seas or in England. But, although they are important cases, their bearing on the present case is not nearly so close as that of M'Clarty v. Steele, 22d January 1881, 8 R. 435. They were cases in which there was no doubt about the locus delicti. M'Clarty v. Steele was an action raised by one Scotchman against another on account of defamation uttered in Penang, in which it was contended that the law of Penang (I understand the law of England) should be applied, but where the case was decided in accordance with the law of Scotland. That case appears to me to be closely applicable when examined, and to warrant or necessitate the conclusion that this case falls to be decided in accordance with the law of Scotland.

"Further, I do not think it established that England was the locus delicti in this case. No authority was cited to that effect. I am disposed to think that Scotland was the locus delicti, because the letters were written and posted and the telegram dispatched in Scotland. It was in Scotland that the defenders did all that they did. They launched the slanders complained of there, leaving them to be taken up and carried forward by the ordinary postal machinery of the country. Now, according to the law of Scotland publication is not essential to the completion of a libel,—Mackay v. M'Kechnie, 1883, 10 R. 537. It may be that no damages could have been claimed had

v. Stein & Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The locus delicti was in England, where the alleged wrong had been committed, and therefore the question whether any wrong had been done to the pursuers entitling them to damages must be decided by the law of England.[1] According to English law no action for damages for defamation could lie unless the defamatory words were published to a third party.[2] Here there had been no publication. Sending a letter through the post was not publication.[3] Dictating a letter to a clerk was not publication, and the name of the clerk was not stated. When a wrong was alleged to have been done in a foreign country no action would lie in the Courts of this country unless the wrong was actionable both in the foreign country and in this country.[4]

Argued for the pursuers;—The locus delicti was in Scotland, where the letter had been written and posted, and the question whether an actionable wrong had been done must be determined according to the law of Scotland.[5] Publication to a third party was not necessary in Scotland.[6] The wrong was done when the letters were posted, just as a contract might be completed by the posting of a letter. The locus of a crime committed through the agency of the post-office was the place where the letter was posted.[7] In England, it had been held that a letter was published by the act of posting in the place where it was posted.[8] (2) Although by the law of England a defamatory statement to the person defamed was not actionable, there had here been publication to third parties. Communication to clerks or typewriters in the employment of the person sending the letter was publication according to English law.[9] So also was the sending of a telegram.[10] A wrong had been committed which was actionable both by the law of Scotland and by the law of England, and an issue should be allowed.[11] the letters not reached the pursuers at all. But when the defenders had done all they could to ensure delivery, the utmost that could be said is that their liability might be suspended while the letters were in transit.

"Still further, there was, in my opinion, sufficient publication in this case; and it is to be noticed that the defenders do not venture to aver that the telegram, which went through the hands of the telegraph clerks, was not published; and it seems to me that there is a sufficient averment of publication of the letters also. At least I think there is no sufficient reason for refusing an issue on the ground of want of publication. What the result may be if it should appear in the end that the letters had not been published need not now be determined.

"On the whole I think that, having regard to the state of the pleadings, the defenders have not succeeded in establishing that there should be no issues. . ."

No. 14. Nov. 17, 1904. Evans & Sons v. Stein & Co.

LORD M'LAREN.—The defenders in this case, who are described as makers of fire-clay goods, Bonnybridge, Scotland, in May 1903, gave an order to the pursuers, who are hydraulic engineers at Wolverhampton, England, for the supply of a pump for their works at Bonnybridge. The pump was wanted immediately, and the defenders say, whether rightly or wrongly it is unnecessary for the purposes of this action to consider, that the pursuers professed to have the pump they required in stock and ready for immediate delivery. Some delay ensued in the execution of the order, and the defenders, who I assume were put to inconvenience by the delay, were very angry, and addressed to the pursuers certain letters and a telegram, which, to say the least, were very intemperate in expression, and which in my judgment were defamatory. If these communications had been addressed to a third party, they would, according to our law, and I do not doubt according to the law of England, have been proper to be submitted to a jury under an action of libel. The present action has been instituted for the recovery of damages for libel or defamation.

The peculiarity of the case is, that while the law of Scotland awards reparation for defamatory statements made to the party accused on the ground of injury to feelings, the law of England, which does not take account of injury to feelings, gives no action for statements addressed to the defamed party himself. As counsel are agreed as to the doctrine of the law of England on this subject, it is unnecessary that it should be proved.

The Lord Ordinary has allowed an issue on the ground, as he states, "that Scotland was the locus delicti, because the letters were written and posted and the telegram despatched in Scotland."

On the best consideration I have been able to give to the Lord Ordinary's reasoning on this subject, I am not able to concur in his opinion. It appears to me that it is of the essence of an injury of the nature of defamation, that the defamatory charge should reach its destination, or should at least become known to someone. While the letters complained of were in transit through Scotland they could not injure the pursuers, because their contents were as secret and as completely protected from disclosure as if they had been locked up in the defenders' desk. It was only when the letters were delivered at Wolverhampton that damage was done; but then the damage was of a kind that the law of England does not consider actionable. In my opinion, the case is exactly the same as if the defender had taken the letters to Carlisle and posted them there, because in their transit through Scotland the letters could do no harm.

I do not overlook the consideration that a contract may be completed by the posting of a letter, on the principle that the post-office is an agency for the transmission of a completed contract. But, as I think, there is no real analogy between the cases. In cases of contract it is considered that the offerer by sending his offer through the post-office invites a reply through the same medium, and thus the post-office, with the assent of the two parties to the proposed contract, is made the agent for the delivery of the reply. This is the principle of the law on the subject, because the post-office does not hold itself out as an agent for anyone, except for the delivery of the material packets that are entrusted to it.

In the present case I cannot hold that the post-office was the agent for

v. Stein & Co.

the publication of a libel, and there was certainly no preliminary assent on the part of the pursuer to the use of the post-office for the transmission of a libel upon himself. I therefore come to the conclusion that no wrong was committed by the defender within the jurisdiction.

It is proper to notice that the pursuers make a point (Article 10) of the fact (as they aver) that the letters complained of were dictated by the defenders to, and typewritten by, a clerk or clerks in their employment, and were copied into the defenders' letter-book.

Now, I am not prepared to hold that the employment of an amanuensis in the ordinary course of business to write letters on business amounts to publication of a libel, should such letters be found to contain defamatory matter.

The work of an amanuensis to whom letters are dictated is confidential employment, and in the general case the amanuensis knows nothing of the parties or the subject in controversy. His duties are purely mechanical, and he cannot, without a breach of confidence, make any use of the information which he may pick up in writing a letter to dictation. It may be that if the person employed to write the letter knew the party to whom the letter was addressed, and the letter conveyed to his mind a defamatory imputation, an action would lie. But in this record we have not even a statement of the name of the clerk to whom the letters were dictated, and there is no suggestion that the letters conveyed any meaning to his mind. In such circumstances I cannot hold that there is a relevant statement of a defamatory libel addressed or uttered to a known person within the jurisdiction. I may add that the difficulty as to formulating a relevant averment in such a case is not removed by the insertion of the word "maliciously." This word, when applied to the act of dictating a letter is obviously a mere expletive, conveying no meaning distinct from that of the averment without the word maliciously.

What I have said regarding the dictation of letters applies with, if possible, greater force to the transmission of telegrams. The duties of the clerks in the telegraphic department of the post-office are strictly confidential, and I think it would be a new departure in the law of libel to hold that a telegraphic message which is not otherwise actionable becomes so because it is read by the post-office clerks who are engaged in its transmission. In this case also, it would, in my opinion, be necessary to make a circumstantial averment of publication to an individual. It would then depend on the evidence of the person named whether the words complained of conveyed any defamatory meaning to his mind.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that no relevant case has been made, and that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied from the action.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with Lord M'Laren that the injury which the pursuer alleges must be held to have been done at Wolverhampton when he opened and read the letter which contains injurious imputations. So long as the letter was not opened and read by anybody except the person who wrote it, no harm was done, and apart from the question whether it was published to the clerks in the pursuer's office or to the telegraph clerk; the injury, if there was injury, was done only when the pursuer opened and read the letter. In these circumstances it appears to me that the argument as to the locus delicti is fallacious, because it proposes the question in the form of a petitio principii. The first question is not where was the locus delicti, but whether there was a delictum or not, and the whole of the somewhat metaphysical discussion as to whether the wrongful act, of which the pursuer says he is entitled to complain, was done in Glasgow or Wolverhampton seems to me altogether beside the question.

The first question is, was there a delictum or actionable wrong; nobody disputes that the defenders' conduct was blameworthy. But the question is whether it is an actionable wrong; and it is only after we have ascertained that, that we can go on to ascertain whether the locus was one or other of the places mentioned on record. The law on that question, as I think it is settled by modern decisions, is that in order to maintain an action ex delicto in the Courts of this country, when the wrong is committed in another country, the wrong must be one for which an action can be maintained both by the law of this country and by the law of the country in which it is said to have been done.

The first question therefore is whether it is an actionable wrong according to our law to address language such as that complained of to the pursuer himself, even although it is not communicated to any third person. I agree with Lord M'Laren that there would be an actionable wrong. But before an action can be maintained here we must next go on to see whether there is a wrong by the law of England also; and we are not put to ascertain that law by the ordinary course of procedure, because it is admitted that by the law of England the communication of language of this kind to the person of whom it is spoken and to nobody else is not an actionable wrong. As I understand it, the admission which was made as to the law of England amounts to this—that the cause of action in a case of slander or libel is not mere insult but injury to reputation, and in as much as there is no injury to reputation in saying things to a man himself, which nobody else hears or knows anything about, no action will lie according to the law of England in respect of such statements. That being so, the law applicable to the present case is laid down in a judgment of great authority by Mr Justice Willes in the case of Philipps v. Eyre.[1] The learned Judge says,—"Where an obligation by contract to pay a debt or damages is discharged and avoided by the law of the place where it was made, the accessory right of action in every Court open to the creditor unquestionably falls to the ground. And by strict parity of reasoning, when an obligation ex delicto to pay damages is discharged and avoided by the law of the country where it was made, the accessory right of action is in like manner discharged and avoided." The question considered in that case was whether liability for an act assumed to have been an actionable wrong according to the law of the colony where it was committed had been discharged by a subsequent act of indemnity in that colony; and the question which the learned

Evans & Sons v. Stein & Co.

Judge was considering was whether the discharge or avoidance of the obligation according to the law of the locus delicti excluded an action in England. But his Lordship's reasoning is directly applicable, because the doctrine, as I understand it, is that the accessory right of action in any Court which may be open to the person complaining depends upon the recognition of an obligation, ex delicto or ex contractu, as the case may be, by the law of his own country, under which he is living, and its coincidence in that particular with the law of the country in which he sues. If there is an obligation ex delicto it may be enforced in any Court having jurisdiction. If there is no obligation ex delicto by the law of the place where the alleged wrong is done, and under which the complainer is living, there is no action anywhere.

I think that principle also goes to meet the pursuer's argument that the defence in this case was founded upon the law of remedy, and not upon the law of obligation. Mr Salvesen argued that if the law of England affords no remedy, the defence on that ground raises a question of remedy which must always be determined by the law of the country in which action is brought. That appears to me to be a confusion of things which ought to be distinguished. The method by which a right may be enforced is a question of procedure; but whether there is any remedy at all, or in other words, whether there is a right of action, is not a question of procedure, but a question of legal right depending on the existence of an obligation ex contractu or ex delicto, and the question of obligation must be determined first, before we can consider what the remedy is.

This appears to me to be in accordance with the doctrine explained by Lord Brougham in Don v. Lippmann.[1] The distinction taken is between the law which governs the constitution of an obligation and the law of procedure which regulates the remedy. Lord Brougham points out that personal rights and obligations must be fixed by the law of the country in which the parties in whom they inhere are living. But they do not necessarily look to the Courts of that country alone as the only tribunals by which the performance of obligations may be enforced or damages may be recovered, because the party complaining is entitled to follow the wrongdoer to the Courts of his own country, or of any other country to the jurisdiction of which he may be subject. If he does so, he must submit himself to the modes of procedure which are adopted by the Court to which he resorts.

This arises from the necessity of the case, because no Court of Justice can invent new forms of procedure and new rules of evidence in order to meet the case of any particular pursuer who comes into Court complaining of wrong done or right infringed in some other country. The rules of evidence and procedure must be applicable to all alike, and therefore when a pursuer comes here he is bound to submit himself to the rules of this Court as to the methods by which his remedy is to be obtained, but he is bound in the first place to shew that according to the law of his own country he has a right under which he is entitled to a remedy. In the present case it has been conceded by the pursuer's counsel that he has no right by the law of his own country which will support an action in the Courts of that country or in any other.

The question then remains whether there is a relevant averment of publication or communication to somebody other than the pursuer. I agree with Lord M'Laren that there is not. I think there may or may not be publication of the language contained in a letter if the letter is dictated to a clerk, or if the words in a telegram are communicated as they must be to telegraph clerks. But whether there has been such communication or not is a question of fact; and, if a pursuer complains of publication as a wrong, he is bound to state specifically to whom the language complained of was made known. Here the averments on that subject are, as I agree with Lord M'Laren, too vague, and too entirely wanting in specification to be sent to proof. I therefore consider that there is no issuable matter in this record.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and dismissed the action.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS action was raised in March 1904 by Mrs A B, wife of T B, against C D, a medical practitioner, for payment of two sums of £2500 each as damages.*

The pursuer made averments to the following effect:—The pursuer and her husband were married on 19th December 1900. On 28th September 1901 the pursuer, on account of her husband's unkind treatment, went to live with her father. With a view to an action of separation and aliment, her law-agents employed the defender as her confidential medical adviser in the proposed litigation. "The defender accepted said employment on pursuer's behalf, in the knowledge and on the footing that said employment was private and confidential, and that his professional services were required for her guidance in the matter of the proposed action." On 24th October 1901 the defender, along with the doctor then attending the pursuer, examined her.

* Another action of damages for slander was at the same time raised by the pursuer's father against the defender, but it is not necessary to refer to it further.

A B v. C D.

"In the course of his examination it was explained to the defender that the pursuer had at one time, on medical advice, taken stimulants and morphia in order to relieve pains from which she suffered greatly, but that she had for some time discontinued doing so, as she had been advised that it was harmful. . . . As the result of his examination, the defender recommended that the pursuer should be sent to a nursing home until her confinement was over. All this was done in the strictest confidentiality and in the fullest reliance upon the defender observing the conditions of his employment, which was, as before stated, of the most confidential character." The defender subsequently expressed views to the pursuer's agents that made it evident that his opinion was adverse to the pursuer with reference to the proposed action.

The action of separation was raised by the pursuer on 13th December 1902. The pursuer's husband defended the action, and a proof was led before Lord Low, which was partly taken in July 1903. The defender was not called as a witness for the pursuer.

On 20th October 1903 her agents received a letter from her husband's agents stating that an examination of the pursuer by her husband's medical witnesses which had been arranged would be attended by the present defender. The pursuer's agents "reminded the defender that he had already been consulted by the pursuer in the matter of said action, that he had attended the pursuer professionally, and that he had had private meetings with the pursuer's agents at which the whole case on pursuer's behalf had been in confidence disclosed to him." The defender attended along with the other medical witnesses for pursuer's husband, and made a lengthy examination of the pursuer.

(Cond. 10) Shortly after making said examination, the defender reported the result of his examination of the pursuer and his opinion on the case to her husband's agents. "He also, at or about the same time, voluntarily gave information to the said parties as to certain matters which he alleged he had ascertained as the result of this prior examination of the pursuer, when, as above condescended on, he had been employed and attended the pursuer as her private and confidential medical adviser, and made to them the statements set forth in Cond. 11. The defender also at or about the same time voluntarily shewed to the pursuer's husband, and to" his agent, "and to the counsel engaged by the pursuer's husband in the said cause, or communicated to said parties, the contents of certain private notes hereinafter mentioned alleged by the defender to have been made by him at the time of his previous examination of the pursuer, and alleged by him to embody the facts concerning the pursuer which he had then learnt, and the result of his said examination. The defender had no permission or authority from the pursuer, or anyone representing her, to disclose to any of said parties any facts which he had learnt as the result of the examination made by him, or of communication made to him, when confidentially employed by the pursuer."

(Cond. 11) "The defender was accordingly requested by the pursuer's husband, or those acting on his behalf, to give evidence. . . . He agreed to do so, and on 24th October 1903, at a diet which had been fixed for hearing the remaining evidence in the case, he was examined as a witness for the pursuer's husband. The defender was not cited as a witness, but gave his evidence voluntarily. In the course of his evidence the defender deponed to certain matters which he alleged that he had learnt on the occasion of his professional visit to the pursuer in October 1901; and he also, at his own hand and without being called on, voluntarily produced a book which he said was his private note-book, containing the notes before referred to, alleged by him to have been made at the time. Said notes, a copy of which was lodged in process in said action, are in the following terms:—

'Oct. 25th. . . .
'[The pursuer's name was here given], 16th Febry. 24th 1900.
'Marriage. Wednesday, 19th Decr. 1900.
'Last period, 21st May.
'Sickness, in April, but took breakfast; last time awful sickness in 'July 1901, when going with Nurse . . . to . . . with 'Mrs . . .
'Menstruation commenced aet. 12, always regular, but always painful, 'and required to be in bed, and took whisky and water. Opiates first by direction of Dr . . . ordered opiates (4 years 'ago).
'Injecting ¼ grain morphia did for the whole time. In end of last March took morphia when annoyed, probably took 2 (¼ gr. tabloids).
'Advised should be sent to a nursing home till after her confinement over, to wean her from morphia, &c., and separate her and her husband, and also her own family, till after the birth of the child. This view not pleasing to patient nor to her father (who has married a second wife), and it seems they are all bent upon inducing premature labour, so as to free the patient of any permanent reminder of this marriage, and, if possible obtain a separation.' The said notes were read or the contents of said notes were stated in Court by the defender in the course of his evidence. . . . The said evidence was intended by the defender to impress, and did in fact impress, the Lord Ordinary unfavourably to the pursuer's case, and but for said evidence she believes that she would have been successful in her action against her husband. The statements in answer are denied, in so far as not coinciding herewith, under reference to the notes of evidence for their terms." *

(Cond. 12) "In disclosing as above condescended on to the pursuer's husband, and to his law-agents and counsel, any facts relative to the pursuer and her state of health, which the defender had or alleged that he had learned in October 1901, when confidentially employed as the pursuer's professional adviser; and further, in shewing to the said parties the notes before referred to, or communicating to them the contents thereof, and in voluntarily giving evidence on behalf of the pursuer's husband with regard to said matters, the defender acted wrongfully and in violation of the duty of secrecy which he owed to the pursuer. The defender having been confidentially employed by pursuer as her medical adviser, in connection with said action, it was his duty not to have accepted employment from the party who was opposed to the pursuer in said litigation with reference to the subject-matter thereof, nor to have disclosed to the parties he did the information obtained by him from the pursuer while acting as her medical adviser. Further, and in any event, it was his duty not to disclose any matters which he had learned, or claimed to have learned, while thus confidentially employed. In breach of said duty, however, the defender gratuitously and unnecessarily disclosed and published the said information, which he had confidentially received. The defender in so doing not merely committed a grave breach of professional etiquette, but was also guilty of a breach of his duty undertaken by him in respect of his confidential employment by the pursuer as aforesaid, and of an actionable wrong. In consequence of the defender's said actings, the pursuer has suffered great loss and damage. She attributes her want of success in said litigation to the defender's actings. In addition, she has been wounded in her feelings and injured in her character. The loss, injury, and damage which she has sustained thereby the pursuer estimates at the sum of £2500, which is the sum first concluded for."

* The following answer was given to this averment:—(Ans. 11) "Admitted that the defender gave evidence in the case on Saturday 24th October 1903, and that he was not cited as a witness. The notes of the defender's evidence are referred to. Admitted that in the course of his evidence the defender stated that he had at the time made notes of the result of his examination of pursuer in 1901, and that at the request of the pursuer's counsel he produced the notes and allowed a copy of them to be made. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the defender's whole evidence was given in answer to specific questions by counsel, that no objection was taken by the pursuer's counsel, and no exception taken by the Court to any question which was put to the defender."

(Cond. 13) "Further, the defender in connection with the matters which he disclosed to the pursuer's husband and his agents as aforesaid made certain slanderous statements of and concerning the pursuer which reflected and reflect seriously on her character and reputation. In particular, the passage in the defender's notes which he communicated to the pursuer's husband, agent, and counsel, as above mentioned, which he afterwards read in open Court, and which is in the following terms :—'Advised she should be sent to a nursing home' [&c., as above quoted], is a gross slander on the pursuer. The said statement means, and was intended to mean, that the pursuer had indicated to the defender her desire, at the time of the defender's visit in October 1901, criminally to procure abortion, that she had endeavoured to obtain his assistance and co-operation to attain this end, and that her sole motive in so doing was to free herself of any permanent reminder of her marriage with her husband. The said statement was entirely unfounded, and was made and published by the defender maliciously. The defender had been informed by the pursuer's medical adviser at said visit that at one time, long prior to the defender's first visit, it had been thought by the pursuer's medical advisers that it might be necessary to induce premature labour, with a view to saving the pursuer's life, which was then in serious danger, but that as matters had turned out this had proved to be unnecessary. At the time of the defender's visit the pursuer had recovered so far that such an operation was quite unnecessary, and no suggestion was ever made with regard to same. This was the sole foundation for the cruelly false and calumnious statement which the defender made, and which he either knew to be false, or made with a reckless disregard of whether it was true or false. The said statement further falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer was a person so addicted to the use of morphia and other drugs that she required special treatment to cure her of the habit."

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The defender having wrongfully and in breach of his duty to the pursuer as her professional adviser, or otherwise of the implied terms of his employment by her, disclosed to third parties confidential matters as condescended on, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to compensation therefor. (2) The defender having slandered the pursuer as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to decree for the loss thereby sustained by her. (3) The statements libelled having been made by the defender voluntarily, and the defender in communicating information to the pursuer's husband and his agents having been in breach of the confidential employment condescended on, the defender's plea of privilege falls to be repelled. (4) In any event, the false and calumnious statements made by the defender as condescended on having been made by him maliciously and without probable cause, the pursuer is entitled to reparation as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (2) The pursuer's averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defender should be assoilzied. (3) The defender's statements libelled are privileged.

The following issues were proposed for the trial of the cause:—

"1. Whether, on or about 22d October 1901, the pursuer employed the defender as her private and confidential medical adviser, to advise her as to her state of health, and in the matter of an action of judicial separation proposed to be instituted by the pursuer against her husband, T. B., and in pursuance of said confidential employment communicated to the defender the evidence proposed to be led on her behalf, and submitted herself, on or about 24th October 1901, to an examination by the defender at her father's house . . . and whether the pursuer, having raised an action of separation and aliment against the said T. B., which was defended by him, the defender, in breach of said confidential employment, on or about 22d, 23d, or 24th October 1903, voluntarily disclosed to the said T. B., to W. R., his law-agent in said action, and to the counsel engaged therein on his behalf, or to one or more of them, matters relative to the pursuer and her state of health, ascertained in the course of said confidential employment, and the nature and result of the examination of the pursuer made as aforesaid, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? 2. Whether, on or about 24th October 1903, in the course of the trial of the said action, the defender, in breach of the said confidential employment, voluntarily gave evidence on behalf of the said T. B., and publicly disclosed the matters mentioned in preceding issue, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer.—Damages laid at £2500."

"3. Whether, on or about 22d, 23d, or 24th October 1903, the defender falsely and calumniously stated to the said T. B., to the said W. R., and to the counsel engaged in said action on behalf of the said T. B., or to one or more of them, of and concerning the pursuer, that the pursuer at the time of the defender's said examination in October 1901 was bent upon inducing premature labour, so as to free her of any permanent reminder of her marriage with the said T. B., meaning thereby that the pursuer was desirous criminally to procure abortion, or used words of like import and effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? 4. Whether on or about 24th October 1903, the defender voluntarily gave evidence as a witness on behalf of the said T. B. in the course of the trial of said action, and falsely and calumniously stated in open Court of and concerning the pursuer that the pursuer at the time of the defender's said examination in October 1901 was bent upon," &c., as in third issue, "meaning

On 12th July 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor by which he disallowed the second and fourth issues proposed by the pursuer, and approved of the first and third.*

* "OPINION.—This is undoubtedly a case of much interest and legal importance. It regards the obligation of a medical man who has been consulted by a party contemplating a litigation with a view to that litigation, and who has made, with a view to the litigation, a medical examination of the party consulting him, not to disclose the results of the examination or the information confided to him.

"The case arose out of an action brought by the pursuer against her husband for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty affecting her health, and she consulted the defender as a medical man with a view to that action. She avers that she or her agents laid before the defender copies of her precognitions, and that the defender, on the pursuer's instructions, examined her medically with a view to the action.

"It is not averred that the defender advised or encouraged the action for judicial separation, but it is averred that the action was raised and was defended by the pursuer's husband, and that a long proof was taken, in which the defender was not examined as a witness for the pursuer. The pursuer further avers that the defender reported the result of his examination of the pursuer to the agents for her husband, and 'voluntarily gave information' to them 'as to certain matters which he had ascertained as the result of his examination of the pursuer,' and the pursuer avers that the defender then shewed to the agents of the pursuer's husband certain private notes which he had made embodying the result of his examination of the pursuer, and containing matter defamatory of the pursuer.

"The pursuer further avers that the defender gave evidence 'voluntarily' in the proof on behalf of the pursuer's husband and against her, and that he produced at the proof a note-book containing the notes made by the defender as to his examination of the pursuer, which were read in Court. The notes are printed in the record, and their general purport appears from the issues. They are said to have been defamatory of the pursuer, and to impute to her among other things an endeavour to procure abortion.

"I think that the result of the action for judicial separation is not given on record, but I understand that it was adverse to the pursuer, and that the pursuer ascribes its adverse result to the evidence of the defender and to his disclosure of what he ascertained by his examination of the pursuer.

"The pursuer states that the defender accepted employment from the pursuer 'on the footing that the employment was private and confidential, and that the defender's professional services were required for her guidance in the intended action,' and that the defender had no authority to disclose the facts he ascertained in the course of that confidential employment.

"The pursuer states that the defender's defamatory statements were made maliciously. But there are no averments on record of any circumstances from which malice could be inferred; and in truth the idea of actual malice seems preposterous and not in the case at all.

"The defender does not plead veritas, nor does he distinctly aver that any duty devolved on him to disclose any part of the pursuer's conduct.

"The pursuer has lodged four issues; the first and second are founded on the defender's breach of confidentiality, the first alleging that breach by disclosure to the pursuer's husband, his law-agent, and counsel; the second, breach of confidentiality by his evidence at the trial.

"The third and fourth issues are issues for defamation by imputing to the pursuer, as innuendoed, an attempt to procure criminal abortion; the

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—On the issues of slander.—(1) It was settled law that a witness, like an advocate or a Judge, was absolutely privileged, so long as his evidence was pertinent to the issue.[1] The Lord Ordinary was therefore right in disallowing the second and fourth issues proposed by the pursuer. (2) The same privilege extended to statements made in precognition, which was only a preliminary to giving evidence. That clearly appeared from an examination of the cases which established the privilege of a witness, advocate, or Judge. They proceeded not on the ground of the right of any of these parties to make libellous statements, but on considerations of public policy. It was held to be necessary in the interests of the administration of justice, that the witness should be free to speak, without the fear of an action of damages.[2] But the same reason would protect statements made in precognition—a necessary preliminary if the evidence was to be taken properly. On disclosure in the third issue being to the defender's husband, his agent, and counsel, and the fourth being disclosure in the witness-box.

"I suppose that the private disclosure averred would be disclosure in precognition, but that is not averred by the pursuer, and I am not at liberty to assume it.

"The defender pleaded in the first place that this duplication of the issues was illegitimate; that there was only one fact averred, and that there should not be more than one issue, or two issues at most; for which position he cited Hassan v. Paterson, 26th June 1885, 12 R. 1164; and Ferguson v. Colquhoun, 1862, 24 D. 1428. These cases are the same, but I do not think they apply. They are cases each regarding a single slander twice uttered, the one in presence of the police, and therefore privileged, the other before the police arrived, therefore,—it was argued,—not privileged. I doubt whether these cases should be extended, and I do not think they apply. Here I see nothing objectionable in the multiplication of issues. For I think there was sufficient difference in the time when, and the circumstances in which the words objected to were spoken, in private and at the trial, to warrant a separate issue for each occasion; and further, it seems to be legitimate to put breach of confidentiality in one issue and defamation in another. No doubt the same act may have caused both injuries; still it is possible that the issue for defamation might fail, as if the defamation were not proved, and the issue put on breach of confidentiality might succeed; or the jury might possibly not be satisfied about the confidentiality, but clear about the defamation; and I think the pursuer was justified in providing against such a contingency; or the damages might be totally different. I think the question is really one of convenience and of precaution against miscarriage; and I think that if the issues should not be thought objectionable in themselves there would be no sufficient reason for reducing their number. There are therefore four issues to be considered.

"I think the issue which is most easily disposed of, and which may therefore be taken first, is the fourth; and I have little difficulty in disallowing it. It is an issue for defamation by evidence given in a Court of justice on oath, not said to be impertinent to the subject under inquiry. Now, I think that nothing is more clearly settled than that in such a case the view taken by the Lord Ordinary, the protection given to the witness was merely illusory; he must give his evidence under the apprehension that if any statement he made was defamatory, he would be exposed to an action of damages based on an averment that he had made the statement in precognition. If the same principles were applied to the case of an advocate, the result would be that he would be privileged with regard to statements made on record if he wrote them himself, but liable to an action of damages if he dictated them to a shorthand writer or clerk. Apart from the question of public policy, statements made in precognition were privileged because they were made confidentially,[1] and could not be disclosed without a breach of duty on the part of those who heard them. In such cases no issue would be allowed.[2] Again, the pursuer complained of only one wrong—the slanderous statement. Even on the most favourable view of her case, she would not be entitled to two issues for the same wrong.[3] She had suffered no injury by the statements made in precognition, the injury was done by the statements made in the witness box. She could not therefore have an issue for the prior statement, at all events without an averment of malice and of facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred.[4] the protection of a witness is absolute; and it is of no consequence whether the evidence is true or false, bona fide or malicious. The leading case on the point is Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, L. R., 7 Eng. and Ir. App. 744, and L. R., 8 Q. B. 255. To the same effect are M'Intosh v. Weir, 2 R. 877; Williamson v. Umphray, 17 R. 905; and Seaman v. Netherclift, 1876, 2 C. P. D. 53. Indeed no point is better settled.

"I do not see any sufficient ground for disallowing the third issue, which is also for defamation. It may be that the issue refers to the precognition of the defender for the pursuer's husband, but the pursuer has not said so, and I do not see that that can be assumed. Even if it did refer to the defender's precognition, I have no doubt that there is no absolute privilege attached to words spoken in precognition, and I am not prepared to say that they are privileged at all. I do not think that malice must be added to this issue on the pursuer's record; but the privilege of the defender may possibly appear at the trial.

"I think that the second issue is covered by the principle which affords absolute privilege to whatever evidence is given in Court by a witness pertinent to the question under inquiry, and that it also must be disallowed.

"The greatest difficulty is about the first issue, but I have come to the conclusion that it must be allowed. The authority for it is A B v. C. D, 13th December 1851, 14 D. 177. No other Scotch authority was quoted, and there seems to be none. But it is quite in point, and I think conclusive; and, sitting in the Outer-House, I consider that I must follow it. I do not mean to say that I doubt it; but only that I think I require to follow it in any case. The pursuer also referred to the report in the British Medical Journal, 28th March 1896, pp. 815 and 882, of the well-known case in which Dr Playfair was defender. I have studied the phraseology of the issue, and the words seem to be very carefully and cautiously chosen. I do not think the pursuer is bound to put more in the issue, and I think that issue should be approved of.

"The result is that I approve of issues first and third, and disallow the issues second and fourth."

A B v. C D.

On the issues of breach of confidence.—No issue should be allowed. There was no absolute rule that a doctor must preserve secrecy about matters which he had learned professionally. That depended on circumstances, and on the nature of the matter disclosed. The pursuer was not entitled to an issue of breach of confidence with regard to the concluding paragraph of the notes read by the defender, because that had been innuendoed as slanderous, and no two issues could be allowed for the same wrong. The medical details contained in the rest of the note were not of a confidential nature. In giving evidence the defender was bound to disclose them, especially as the pursuer was represented, and took no objection. With regard to the alleged disclosure in precognition, the pursuer suffered no actionable wrong. The Lord Ordinary, in allowing the first issue, proceeded on the case of A B v. C D.[1] But that case was distinguishable, first, because the statement there made was of a defamatory character; secondly, because in the present case the disclosure was made to the pursuer's husband, or to persons representing him, who had a right to be informed as to the pursuer's health. The defender could not have pleaded confidentiality, the pursuer could.[2]

If any part of the case was relevant, it was not suited for jury trial, and should be sent for proof before a Judge.

Argued for the respondent;—On the issues of slander.—(1) The fourth issue should be allowed. Admitting that an ordinary witness was entitled to an absolute privilege, the rule did not extend beyond cases where the witness was bound to give evidence. A skilled witness, like the present defender, although he must obey a citation, need not give evidence unless he pleased. Here, the defender had not even been cited. Again, if a witness answered a question which he was not bound to answer, and if in answering he was committing a breach of duty, he was not privileged.[3] That was the present case; the defender should have objected to any question with regard to his examination of the pursuer, and his objection would have been sustained. Even if it could be maintained, on the English authorities, that all witnesses had an absolute privilege, Scots law had not adopted the English rules as to privilege in legal proceedings, e.g., as to the privilege of a party to an action.[4] (2) There was no privilege as to communications made by a witness out of the witness-box. He was under no obligation to be precognosced, and therefore had no privilege. Even assuming that he was entitled to answer questions in the witness-box, and incurred no liability thereby, that did not justify slanderous statements made previously, nor could it furnish an indemnity for them.[5] On the opposite assumption, a witness who was precognosced but not examined would be liable for what he said, whereas a witness who was examined would not. Besides the pursuer's statements were not confined to formal precognition, they amounted to a general averment of ultroneous communications, on which no privilege was possible.

On the issues of breach of confidence.—Apart altogether from slander, the defender, in disclosing facts learned in a professional capacity, committed an actionable wrong. He had a duty not to disclose these facts, and the violation of that duty, resulting as it had done in injury to the pursuer, was actionable, even although the statements made were not of a libellous character, and apart from all question as to their truth. This principle had been established in the case of a doctor, and also in cases of other professional men and agents.[1]

(4) The case was suitable for jury trial. At all events, the Court, in a question of proof or jury trial, would not interfere with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur with the decision of the Lord Ordinary rejecting the proposed issues based upon evidence given by the defender in the witness-box in a judicial proceeding. Nothing is, I think, more clearly settled in our law than this, that a witness is absolutely privileged in giving his evidence, pertinent to the issue, and cannot be subjected in damages for slander for what he says in the Court of justice.

As regards the two issues which the Lord Ordinary has approved in the case, I am unable to agree with him in allowing the first of the two issues. It is evident that information which a medical man obtains as to a patient in his professional capacity is confidential, and ought not to be disclosed to others. At the same time, it must depend on circumstances whether any disclosure made to others is a wrong, for which compensation may be sought by an action of damages in a Court of law. And it would be necessary that a pursuer proposing to take an issue should be most specific in putting in issue the matters said to have been disclosed, of which it is alleged that the disclosure was an actionable wrong. The form of the issue proposed in this case is such as I have never seen. The question asked is only whether there were disclosed "matters relative to the pursuer and her state of health." I do not think that any such issue should be allowed. It is also objectionable because, if allowed, it might enable the pursuer to bring forward the alleged slander dealt with in the second of the approved issues, and this might plainly lead to injustice, for it might lead to damages being given twice for the same wrong.

As regards the second issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary, and the relative issue in the other case, I am of opinion that these must be allowed. The words of alleged slander complained of seem to me to be such as fairly to bear the innuendo that the pursuers put upon them, and if the innuendo were made out to the satisfaction of the jury under the directions of the Judge at the trial there would be a case for damages.

I have only to add that I do not see at present any sufficient ground for inserting a statement of malice in the issue. It is possible that a question may arise on that matter at the trial, but in my judgment the case ought to be sent to trial on the issue as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says that this is a case of much interest and legal importance. That your Lordship also thinks so I infer from the observations which you have made upon the established rule of law, that everyone giving evidence in a Court of justice, being admissible as a witness, and answering the questions which are properly put to him, which those allowed by the Court are presumed to be, is privileged, and that it is in the interests of justice, and the public for whom justice is administered, that he should not give his answers under any apprehension of being liable to an action of damages should his evidence be defamatory of anyone, whether a party to the action or not. The ground upon which that rule of law is founded your Lordship has explained, and it is indeed obvious. It is in the interests of the public that the truth should be ascertained in a Court of justice, and that witnesses should give their evidence without any such apprehension or fear.

Your Lordship is of opinion that the second issue should be allowed here, because it does not relate to the statements made by the defender in the witness-box, but to the information previously given by him to the party who called him as a witness. I think the interests of justice, and of the public in its administration, apply to the one as well as to the other. It would be no encouragement to the fearless speaking of the truth in the witness-box to say to the witness:—"You need be under no apprehension of an action of damages for what you shall swear to in the witness-box, but keep in view that you are liable to such action if you have beforehand informed the party who calls you of the facts which you can testify, and to testify which you are called."

Now, what are the facts in this case? The case does present, as I have said, agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, questions of very general interest and importance, but still, like most cases, it has its own specialties and peculiarities, of which the chief here is that the whole matter arises out of a disagreement between husband and wife. The wife believed — I assume honestly — she had been illused by her husband, so as to affect her health, and that to such extent that she could not endure its continuance, and therefore left his society and residence, and went to reside with her father at some distance. Then, with a view to obtain separation from her husband and her support from him without the necessity of living with him and submitting to the continuance of the illusage, it occurred to her, or she was advised, that her proper course was to raise an action of separation and aliment. With a view to that, she was advised to resort to the defender, who is a well-known and indeed very eminent member of the medical profession, and that with the view of ascertaining and getting his testimony, should his medical opinion prove favourable to her, that the condition of broken-down health in which she undoubtedly was, was attributable to such illusage as she alleged her husband had subjected her to, and was not attributable to any other cause. The defender visited her in order to examine her person, and ascertain from her the facts connected with the matters upon which she desired his medical opinion and advice. He did examine her person, and questioned her as to matters about which she might not have given information without questioning, the result being as noted at the time in the defender's professional note-book. (His Lordship read the defender's note of October 25, 1901.)—Now, these are the notes which the defender made on and at the time of his examination and interview. No one can doubt that these notes were made privately, and with a view to reminding him, should his services be again required regarding what he had seen and heard, the impression thereby made upon him and the advice which he gave.

Now, I cannot see any impropriety, and indeed I feel sure that there was none, in his making these notes with regard to what had passed, and what he had been told of the lady's habits, and the impression made upon him, and the advice he gave, that she should go to a nursing home until the birth of her child, that being in his opinion the best for her health and so also the best for the child of which she was pregnant, and the impression made upon his mind by the way in which they took that advice, viz., that they were not anxious that the gestation should be prolonged by sending her to a nursing home to be attended to there. The action of separation and aliment is brought by the wife against her husband. She was of course at liberty to call the defender as her witness, to give the result of his examination, and the opinion which he thereupon had formed, and he would have been called, no doubt, as her witness if he had not most distinctly given both her and her father to understand that his opinion was not favourable to her view, and that he attributed her condition, not to the alleged cruel treatment by her husband, but to her own infirmity and bad state of health, produced or aggravated by the way in which she had for a long while been living—using opiates, and alcoholics largely and constantly. It so happened that, about two years after his examination of the pursuer, and his interview with her, the defender was resorted to professionally by her husband. He avers, and probably nobody will doubt the truth of the averment, that, when resorted to by the husband, and asked by him to examine the pursuer, he accepted the employment and made the examination without any recollection of having examined the pursuer before and upon her own employment, but that he was informed then that this was the lady he examined two years before. He is then asked by the husband:—"Well, what passed between you and my wife then? My wife resorted to you for advice upon her then condition, tell me what was that condition, and what passed between you and my wife regarding it." I cannot think it doubtful that the defender acted not only legally but with perfect propriety in giving the husband information of what had passed between him and his wife, but it is I think unnecessary for us to decide that, if the view be sound which I take of the subsequent examination of the defender as a witness, although called not by the wife, but by the husband in the action of separation and aliment.

Was he in that action an admissible witness for the husband? We must hold that he was, for his evidence was admitted by the Judge, and we cannot hold that the less conclusive because no objection was taken to his admissibility. The only parties interested were the husband and the wife, and they were respectively represented by presumably competent law-agents and counsel. The Judge does not always, or even usually, interpose any objection to the competency of a witness. Nor does he generally, although perhaps not so infrequently, suggest an objection to the competency of questions put to a witness. If the parties are agreed, and the Judge interposes no objection, then the evidence given by that witness is competent evidence. Now, it is stated, and not disputed upon record here, that all the evidence which the defender gave was in answer to questions which were not objected to by either party or by the learned Judge. I must therefore hold that in that action between husband and wife the defender was a competent witness, and that what he was asked, and what he gave evidence upon, was legally admissible evidence upon which the Court could and must proceed in determining the facts according to which the case before the Court was to be determined.

It was contended that although no action at the instance of the pursuer can be sustained against the defender for having given that evidence—I will speak about her father by and by—an action may be brought against him for having given the information which led to him being called as a witness. There is no averment or suggestion that any statement was made previous to the trial or previous to the examination of the defender as a witness, other than of the facts which he was asked about and gave his evidence about in the witness-box. He furnished the husband with the note which he made, and which I have already read. I have also already said that he, in my opinion with perfect propriety, informed the husband of the note which he had made of the interview with his wife, and the opinion which he had then formed and still retained—whether my opinion is right upon that or not, he in point of fact furnished the husband with the note, and it must have been produced in process before he was examined upon it in the witness-box, and before it was put in evidence.

Lord Trayner.—No. It was handed to him.

Lord Young.—It was before both parties, was before the wife and her advisers as well as before the husband and his advisers, and was before the Judge. It may be assumed that the defender was entitled to refuse if asked to give information privately in precognition or otherwise, although, as I have said, he acted with perfect propriety in giving it. No one is bound to submit to precognition by a litigant, or intending litigant. I have already pointed out that the professional note-book was legal evidence—regularly and without objection judicially admitted without reference to information by precognition or otherwise prior to the trial. It is therefore obvious that had there been no such prior information the notes would have been produced, and the testimony of their writer regarding the facts noted given publicly in open Court exactly as they were. How the Judge would or ought to have dealt with an objection by the witness had he seen fit to state any, either to produce the notes or answer all or any of the questions put to him about them, we are not called upon to decide.

I have indicated, I hope sufficiently, my opinion that the husband was legally entitled to all the evidence which he obtained and adduced regarding the examination of his wife by the medical man to whom she resorted in the circumstances, as to which there is no doubt or indeed dispute.

What I have said refers principally at least to the action at the instance of the wife against the defender. Her father, it is or may be suggested, is in a different position. I cannot see any ground for that. The rule and the reason for it which your Lordship referred to, and to which I have made so frequent reference, of privilege against any action of damages for defamatory facts sworn to by a witness in Court, apply not only to the parties in the action before the Court, but also to any outsider. A witness is not liable to an action of damages for an answer to a question relevant to the case in which he is examined—is not liable to a third party any more than to a party in the action. If that were not so, then, to a large extent at least, the reason for the rule would be frustrated. Therefore I can see no distinction between the wife and her father with respect to this action against the defender, and my opinion upon the whole matter is, that there is here no relevant case against him, and I think it is only just and fair to him to state, so far as my opinion goes, that nothing which he is alleged to have done or said was improper.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the second and fourth issues proposed by the pursuer cannot be allowed. They refer to statements made by the defender when under examination as a witness. I think it well settled that what is stated by a witness in the witness-box is absolutely privileged, except in the case where the witness gives expression to a calumnious statement altogether irrelevant to the subject-matter of the case in which he is being examined, or to the questions put to him. The present defender's statements do not fall within that exception. I further agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the pursuer is entitled to the third issue. What is there complained of is a statement made by the defender of and concerning the pursuer, which (as innuendoed by the pursuer) is clearly actionable; and the innuendo does not appear to me unreasonable. On the contrary, I think the statement complained of quite capable, and reasonably capable, of being read as meaning what the pursuer avers the defender did mean. I am, however, for disallowing the first of the issues proposed by the pursuer, and which the Lord Ordinary has allowed. It is founded on a breach of confidence. But I cannot say that every breach of confidence is actionable. A medical man called in to advise a patient is well advised when he declines to say even that he had been consulted, but it depends on what he says whether his statement is actionable or not. It may be indiscreet, but not actionable. For example, if a medical man said to A that he had been called in to see B, and on being asked by A what was the matter with B, he replied that he was labouring under a severe cold—that would not be actionable. On the other hand, if he stated that B was labouring under some malady, the consequence of misconduct, that would or might be actionable. In the present case, if you exclude the part of the defender's statement which as innuendoed is slanderous, there is nothing in it which can be regarded as an actionable breach of confidence. In coming to the conclusion that this issue should be disallowed, I am not influenced to any extent by the consideration that the statement complained of was made to the pursuer's husband. In the position in which the pursuer and her husband stood towards each other—and that in the knowledge of the defender—I think the defender had no right to make to the pursuer's husband any statement which he could not justifiably, or without incurring liability for damages, have made to a stranger.

LORD MONCREIFF.—As all your Lordships have done, I have considered this case most anxiously. I agree that no issue should be allowed as to the evidence given by the defender in Court. The privilege of a witness is absolute, and the pursuer at the trial did not even object to the defender's evidence on the ground of confidentiality. The plea of confidentiality is the privilege of the client or patient; and if the client or patient does not object the witness is entitled and bound to disclose what was communicated to him in confidence.

But the Lord Ordinary has allowed two issues in respect of statements made not on oath. The first is based on an alleged breach of confidentiality, the damages claimed being £2500.

I am not prepared to hold that statements voluntarily given in answer to questions in precognition are necessarily privileged. But the pursuer was bound to specify and put in issue the statements complained of. She has not done so, and does not propose to do so, and I am not surprised, because apart from the alleged slander at the conclusion of the defender's notes there is nothing in them to warrant the large claim made. But the alleged slander forms the subject of the second issue, on which also damages (£2500) are asked; and thus the two issues overlap. The pursuer is not entitled to double damages for the same wrong. I am therefore on that ground for disallowing the first issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary. At the same time the breach of confidentiality, if proved, may possibly have some bearing on the second issue allowed.

The second issue as to the alleged slander raises questions of considerable delicacy. I felt from an early stage of the discussion that a satisfactory decision upon them could not be arrived at without inquiry. The defender pleads that the communications which he made to the pursuer's husband and his legal advisers in October 1903 were privileged; and he may succeed in proving that they were. But at the present stage we must decide that question on the assumption that the pursuer will succeed in proving her averments. And on that assumption, having considered the authorities, I have come to the conclusion that a case of privilege is not disclosed on the pursuer's averments. The words complained of are undoubtedly calumnious. They are not said to be true in the sense that the pursuer and her father intended to produce premature labour for the reason alleged. Veritas is not pleaded. If the pursuer had averred that the defender at once communicated his suspicion to the pursuer's husband, a case of privilege might perhaps have been held to be disclosed on the ground that such a communication must be presumed to have been made to prevent the commission of a crime of which it was the husband's right and interest to be warned. But she does not aver that, and it is admittedly not the case. The defender did not communicate his suspicions until two years later, and then according to the pursuer, in circumstances which prima facie do not infer privilege.

Nov. 18, 1904.
A B v. C D.

The defender, however, may succeed at the trial in shewing that he had a right and a duty to make the disclosure. This will depend mainly at least upon the evidence as to what took place at the first interview between the defender and the pursuer and her father. If the defender can prove that what was said upon that occasion, or what he observed, was such as to induce a reasonable belief in the truth of his suspicion, it may go a long way to establishing a case of privilege even although, as we must assume, the suspicion was unfounded.

If the defender succeeds in satisfying the Court that the communication was privileged the pursuer cannot succeed without proving that the communication was made maliciously. Personal malice is not averred or suggested, and the first thing the Judge will have to decide is whether the pursuer has made averments which entitle her to a proof of malice. If he holds that she has not, the defender will be entitled to a verdict. If he holds that she has, the question of malice will be left to the jury.

I should have preferred that these delicate questions should be tried by a Judge without a jury. But the pursuer does not agree to this course, and the Lord Ordinary, a Judge of long experience, has selected trial by jury. We do not, according to practice and decisions in both Divisions of the Court, interfere with a Lord Ordinary's discretion as to the mode of inquiry in the absence of very exceptional circumstances.

I therefore reluctantly agree with the majority that the second issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary should be allowed as it stands, and the case go to trial.

THE following was the interlocutor:—"Disallow the first issue proposed for the pursuer, to which extent alter the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Approve of the remaining issue as altered and adjusted, appoint same to be the issue for the trial of the cause, and remit to the said Lord Ordinary to proceed as accords: Finds neither party entitled to expenses since 12th July last."

Husband and Wife—Constitution of Marriage—Consent de præsenti—Written declaration before witnesses—Mental reservation.—In a declarator of marriage it is not sufficient for the pursuer to produce a writing signed by the parties stating that they have taken each other as husband and wife. The pursuer must also shew the circumstances in which the writing was completed, and shew that they were consistent with an intention on the part of the parties to contract marriage.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

MRS CHRISTINA SOPHIA KEITH OR MORSE OR DURAN, widow of George Morse, engineer, Glasgow, brought this action against Francis Duran, commission-agent, Glasgow, for declarator that she was lawfully married to him by mutual declaration signed before witnesses.

The pursuer averred that she and the defender, on 19th November 1902, "accepted each other as husband and wife, and on said date, at 65 West Regent Street, Glasgow, signed an acknowledgment to that effect in presence of Alexander Watson, insurance-agent, and Margaret Kennedy or Watson, his wife, both residing at 96 Thistle Street, Garnethill, Glasgow."

The acknowledgment referred to, which was produced, was in the following terms:—

(No. 11 of Process.) "65 West Regent Street, Glasgow, 19th November 1902.

"We, Francis Duran, commission-agent, residing at 189 Hill Street, Garnethill, Glasgow, and Christina Sophia Keith or Morse, housekeeper, residing at 189 Hill Street aforesaid, do hereby accept and acknowledge each other as husband and wife.

"Alexander Watson, witness. FRANCIS DURAN.

"Margaret Watson, witness. CHRISTINA SOPHIA MORSE."

It was signed by both parties in the presence of witnesses, and was prefixed to a petition to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, stating that the parties had contracted an irregular marriage before the witnesses named, and praying for certification, in terms of 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 96, sec. 2, that the parties were lawfully married to one another, and for warrant to the registrar of the district to register the marriage. The petition was signed by both parties. The petition, which was partly printed, and for the rest written by Robert Watson, writer, Glasgow, in the presence of both pursuer and defender, was in the ordinary form used in such petitions. The petition was never presented to the Sheriff.

The defender's averments, so far as material, were as follows:—"Explained that the pursuer and defender had intercourse, in consequence of which the pursuer became pregnant. She urged the defender to marry her, but he declined. She then requested the defender to sign a document, on the distinct representation made by her that it should not constitute a marriage between the parties, but should merely fix the paternity of the child on the defender, and enable the pursuer to vindicate her good name if and when attacked, by exhibition of the document. On these representations the defender signed the document in question. The parties did not intend to marry, and in point of fact there was no exchange of consent to do so."

The defender produced and founded on two declarations, written by the pursuer to his dictation, and dated 17th November 1902 (two days before the alleged ceremony of marriage).*

* (No. 8 of Process.)

"I hereby confess that this marriage, which never would have taken place, as there was no promise nor intention for either party, has been brought about by my own carelessness and foolishness with you, and as you go through this marriage to save my good name, in return I now give you this, and hereby promise not to claim any money, property, or whatsoever you may have or receive either for myself or my two children.

The defender pleaded;—(1) There having been no exchange of consent between the parties to marry, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor, with expenses. (3) Separatim, the pursuer being personally barred from insisting in the present action, it should be dismissed, with expenses.

A proof was led. The following narrative of the import of the evidence is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary :—

"It appears that the pursuer kept a boarding-house; and that the defender, who was a Spaniard, became an inmate early in 1901. He had come to Scotland about 1897, and appears since then to have resided chiefly in Scotland, where he obtained employment as a clerk. The circumstances which led to his residence in Scotland have not been explained. He says that he could not speak a word of English when he came to Scotland. But in 1904 when he gave his evidence in this case, he spoke the language well.

"It is a fact of first-class importance, and there is no doubt about it, that at some time during his residence in the pursuer's boarding-house, illicit intercourse took place between the pursuer and defender. They differ in the point of time. He says that it occurred for the first time about a fortnight after he came to the house, and he gives the details with considerable realism. According to him the advances came from the pursuer. His story may be true or may be false; it is hard to say, because it is impossible to place much reliance on either of the parties. It is not clear, however, that he had any inducement to misrepresent the matter. She post-dates the first connection until April 1902, and I think she gives no particulars; but, whichever way it happened, the result was that she became pregnant. Perhaps the fact is of more than the ordinary importance, because I think there would have been no marriage or marriage ceremony had there been no pregnancy; at least not at that time. She first suspected her condition in July 1902, and he and she agreed to consult a doctor. They called on Doctor Howie, the object of their visit being to determine the question of pregnancy. Doctor Howie was unable to give a decided opinion, but, shortly afterwards, the pregnancy became certain. The only intelligible reason for this consultation is that they intended, if pregnancy were established, to be married or to go through a ceremony of marriage.

"At that time nothing was done, but the question of marriage or of a marriage ceremony was frequently spoken about; and the next

"Glasgow, Nov. 17, 1902."

(No. 13 of Process.)

"To your dictation, Francis Duran, I now write as promised.

"I hereby confess that this marriage, which never would have taken place, as there was no promise or intention by either party, has been brought about by my own carelessness. And as you Francis Duran go through this to save my good name, in return I now give you this, and hereby promise not to claim as your wife any money, property, or whatsoever you may have or receive, either for myself or my children, Constance and Phyllis Morse.

significant step was that in or about October 1902 the defender consulted Mr Watson, a writer. This consultation is an important fact in the case, which the defender has considerable difficulty in explaining. He apparently suggests that he consulted Mr Watson in order to ascertain how it would be possible to go through the form of a marriage so that it might appear to the pursuer's parents that they were married, while it would not be binding. It is difficult to accept this view, and Mr Watson depones that he did not so understand the matter. He says that the defender asked what he should do to carry through a marriage, and that he (Mr Watson) advised him. He (the defender) made it perfectly clear (Mr Watson says), that he was desirous of going through a marriage, and was in earnest about it. Mr Watson explained to him how a marriage might be carried out under the Act 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 96. Mr Watson, as he says, told the parties that registration was not essential to marriage, but was important with a view to preservation of proof of the marriage, which depended on consent alone. But I am not certain that he succeeded in making that distinction clearly intelligible to the defender. Certainly the defender professes the most confident belief, and repeats it frequently, that no marriage could be binding without the intervention of a magistrate or minister. He seemed to regard any other law as unthinkable. If he really thought so, and possibly he did, that was his error as to the law, and I do not see how he can escape the consequence of the error.

"Being thus informed, he and the pursuer resumed consideration of the question of a marriage ceremony; and I now come to two very perplexing and singular documents, Nos. 8 and 13 of process, both of which bear the date 17th November 1902, a date which there is no reason to question; that is to say, they bear a date two days before the acknowledgment on which the pursuer founds.

"Nothing can be imagined more strange than the evidence of the parties about these two documents, and whether they are talking falsely or only mere nonsense it is not easy to say. They are both in the handwriting of the pursuer, and they have substantially the same meaning, so far as that is discoverable. The pursuer says that they were written to the dictation of the defender, that there were several such documents (so she seems to say), but she signed only two, and these she signed reluctantly and only because the defender, as she thought, would not sign the declaration of marriage, No. 11 of process, unless she signed these other documents. Why she signed two documents she could not tell.

"The defender's evidence is still more singular. He swears that the second document (No. 13) was written because the first looked like a letter, and the second was written on what he calls legal paper.

"Perhaps it is unnecessary to complicate the case with two unintelligible documents, and I think the former (No. 8) may be held to be superseded by the latter (No. 13); it was so according to the defender. That document (and No. 8 also), in speaking of 'this marriage,' plainly refers to the marriage or ceremony about to be performed. The more important points in this letter seem to be these:—First, there is an acknowledgment by the pursuer that as the defender was going 'through this' (that is the marriage) 'to save my good name, I now give you this'; then follows an obligation by her 'not to claim as your wife any money, property, or whatsoever you may have to receive either for myself or my children.' The document is signed by the pursuer, and is followed by the perplexing postscript—'I do hereby promise that this will be burned, unseen by any eye but mine, on the death of writer if she has been faithfull.'

No. 16.

"The body of this singular document no doubt furnishes a reason for the acknowledgment different from but quite consistent with marriage, and asserts that there had been no previous promise of marriage, but it is quite consistent with present acknowledgment; and, indeed, I think that, according to its true construction, it imports on his part an acknowledgment of marriage, while he takes care to protect his money.

"The postscript is the most singular part of the whole. It was also written by the pursuer, but it is the defender who speaks in it; and I take special note of the last words, which are that the document is to be burned on the pursuer's death if she has been faithful. Why it was to be burned is not obvious; but these words are important, and they can hardly be read as having any other meaning than if she had been faithful as a wife to her husband.

"The documents are, however, perhaps too incoherent and eccentric to be pressed very far either way. But I consider that they favour the pursuer's case of acknowledgment of marriage rather than the defence.

"I understood that these documents were left in the hands of the defender, and that he produced them in process, and has founded on them with the view of shewing that he did not intend marriage by the declaration stating that he did.

"On 19th November the declaration of marriage, to which reference has already been made, was signed in Mr Watson's office. I have already referred to that document at length, and have only to add that I am unable to see that its force is weakened by the two singular writings which preceded it. It may possibly be suggested that it is an inchoate and incomplete deed, seeing it is a portion of a petition to the Sheriff which was never presented. But Mr Watson explained to the parties that it was sufficient to make marriage without registration, and I am not aware of any authority to the contrary."

The pursuer deponed,—"Some time before the marriage the defender asked me to sign a document. (Q.) What sort of document was it he asked you to sign? (A.) He said he did not wish my children to come into any money he might be left, and he asked if I was willing to sign the paper so that my children would not come into any money left to him. I agreed to sign that. I agreed when he asked me, but when I went to his office and saw what he had written I refused to sign lies. (Q.) On the 17th of November I think you signed two papers, Nos. 8 and 13 of process? (A.) I thought I only signed one, but he made out so many, trying to make me to sign it. I would not do it. He changed them about and about, trying to get me to sign it. He may have kept some of the others. (Shewn Nos. 8 and 13 of process)—Both those documents are in my handwriting. (Reads No. 8 of process)—(Q.) Do you remember signing that? (A.) I added that because I thought if he was going to misbehave, he was not going to compel me to live with him. By the Court.—I mean that I added the part about not compelling me to live with him, as he had written down on paper that he was to behave as he liked. Examination continued.—I added the last sentence. The rest was his composition.

Duran v. Duran.

(Q.) Did you write it to his dictation? (A.) No, he wrote about a dozen copies. (Reads No. 13 of process)—I think that was the last of the two. I thought he had destroyed the other one. He wrote it down himself, and I copied it—both of them, every paper that he wrote. (Q.) As regards the P.S., was that intended to be signed by him? (A.) Yes, I suppose he had not signed it. I signed those two documents very unwillingly. It took weeks to get me to sign them. (Q.) After the signature of those two documents what occurred in the way of your getting married to the defender? (A.) He told me he had been to see the lawyer, and asked me to come up to the office and see the paper. I refused to sign. I said that whatever happened I could not sign such a paper. He said, 'Well, I have been to the lawyer, and I won't go back till you do sign it.' I went on for a week or two, and at last I thought I could not be any worse than I was, and I could not delay the marriage any longer, and I signed it. (Q.) Do you mean the two documents Nos. 8 and 13 of process? (A.) Yes. . . . After that ceremony had been gone through the defender treated me as his wife. (Q.) But was there any question about keeping the marriage a secret one? (A.) Yes. He said he did not wish the marriage to be known until we could get a house of our own, as he did not want his name used in keeping lodgers. He allowed me to tell my own people then. I told my own people, but not the gentlemen in the house. . . . After the marriage the defender and I did not occupy the same room. We had not enough of room. I had the two children with me, and he had only a single bed. We had to occupy it sometimes, if I had my father or anyone using my room. (Q.) But although not occupying the same room, were your relations towards each other those of married people? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did the defender at any time promise to marry you? (A.) Yes, certainly. (Q.) You have now said that the defender intended to marry you, and promised to marry you: in these circumstances, can you explain how you signed the document No. 8 of process, which states that there was no promise and no intention to marriage? (A.) Because I had no choice. (Q.) What do you mean by that? (A.) Because he said he would not go back and arrange for the marriage till I had signed it. It took me about a fortnight to sign it. (Q.) I ask you, is what you signed untrue? (A.) Yes, it is untrue,—part of it. He told me he would write a paper so that my children would not come into any money of his, but when I went to the office this was what he had written. I would not sign. (Q.) You did sign it. (A.) Yes. (Q.) You wrote it in your own writing? (A.) Yes, I copied his. (Q.) Is it not true? (A.) No. (Q.) Why did you sign it? (A.) Because I was compelled. I had no choice. (Q.) Who compelled you? (A.) He did. (Q.) How? (A.) Because he would not go back to arrange for the marriage till I signed it. . . ."

Robert Watson deponed,—"I am a writer and notary-public at 65 West Regent Street, Glasgow. I know the defender in this case. I first saw him about five weeks before the 18th November 1902. As regards how I came to see him on that occasion, he called upon me to ask what he should do to carry through a marriage, and I advised him. (Q.) Did he make it clear to you that he was desirous of going through a marriage? (A.) Perfectly clear, and he was in earnest, I understood, about it. . . . On the 19th, when the pursuer and defender called together at the office, my son came in by arrangement, bringing his wife with him, and the two parties intending to get married. I told my son just to write down this form. He wrote it down, and then after it was written down I told the parties that they might rise and take each other by the right hand. Addressing first Francis Duran, I said, 'That is your name,' and he said it was. I asked him, 'You, being in your sane and sober senses, take Christina Sophia Keith or Morse to be your wife?' and he then turned and said 'Yes.' Then turning to Christina Sophia Keith or Morse, I said, 'Do you take Francis Duran to be your husband?' and she said 'Yes.' Then I said to him, 'Put on the ring, if you please.' He had not a marriage ring, but he had another ring, a sort of signet ring, and he put that on as a symbol of the ceremony. Then they took each other by the right hand, and I turned to the two witnesses. . . . Then my son took the petition over to the desk, and invited first Francis Duran to sign it. He came and signed. Then his wife followed, and I think that was the whole ceremony. He said, 'Well, we are going abroad, both of us, for a short time, but we will endeavour to be home in time to get the marriage registered'; and I said to my son, 'Put in the margin.' I addressed the wife particularly, and I said, 'I warn you to get this marriage registered. It is a marriage without registration, but you may save trouble, and it preserves evidence for all time,' and I put this on the margin. I think that is all. (Q.) Have you any doubt that the defender understood perfectly that he was taking the pursuer to be his wife? (A.) He entered into it freely and voluntarily. He took the initiative in all that was done, and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that it is a base attempt to back out of it."

The two witnesses gave evidence to the same effect.

The defender deponed,—"(Q.) Did you ever agree to go through a marriage with her which should be binding? (A.) No. (Q.) You have told us that she proposed that you should go through a form of marriage? (A.) Yes. I agreed, as long as there were not any representatives of the State or Church, because I knew, and she told me too, that unless those authorities were present, that that was not binding at all. I was afraid that this thing would be binding, and I requested her to make me a form of paper stating that there was no promise of marriage, that we never had such an intention, and she agreed to do it. . . . My interview with Mr Watson was, I think, one or two weeks before the declaration, No. 8 of process, was signed. Cross.—(Q.) On the assumption that Mr Watson advised you that there could be no marriage without registration, what was the use of this declaration? (A.) He did not tell me it would not be marriage without registration. He told me we could register that marriage before three months, otherwise we could not register at all. (Q.) You intended to register it? (A.) No. (Q.) What is the meaning, then, of these declarations being got at all if there was to be no marriage gone through? (A.) It was got just to shew there never had been any promise between her and me. I wanted it in black and white. (Q.) How was that to affect the matter if you were not to go through a marriage? (A.) We only went there to save her people's name."

On 3d June 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that on or about 19th November 1902 the pursuer and defender were lawfully married to each other at Glasgow by mutual declaration, subscribed by the parties before Alexander Watson, insurance-agent, residing at 96 Thistle Street,

No. 16. Garnethill, Glasgow, and Mrs Margaret Kennedy or Watson, his wife."*

Duran v. Duran.

* "OPINION.—By this action the pursuer, Mrs Morse, concludes for declarator of marriage between her and the defender, Francis Duran, by mutual declaration dated 19th November 1902, and for decree for adherence and aliment. Counsel for the pursuer held the case to be clear as depending on an unambiguous written acknowledgment; but I am rather disposed to take the view of the counsel for the defender that it is exceptionally difficult and doubtful, and I think the evidence extremely unsatisfactory and unreliable, and little to the credit of either party. But the case falls within a brief compass. The evidence, such as it is, is short and scanty. The case is not complicated by correspondence, and the facts of importance are few. A child was born to the pursuer on 15th March 1903, the paternity of which the defender does not deny; but the view that the interests of the child should be protected by a tutor was not presented, and, bearing in mind the position and means of the parties, it does not seem to me to be necessary.

"The pursuer is a widow, and at the date in question was about thirty-three years of age. The defender is a Spaniard, and he was then about twenty-six. He is a Roman Catholic, but nothing seems to turn on that circumstance. No question of foreign law or of jurisdiction has been raised.

"Although I am compelled to comment on the evidence very unfavourably, yet nothing against the character of either party has been disclosed except what appears in the proof; and there seems no great inequality in social position.

"I have not found any sufficient foundation for the defender's plea of personal bar; and his case consists in a denial of the consent averred by the pursuer. The question is just whether a marriage by consent on 19th November 1902 has or has not been proved.

"The pursuer's case is rested primarily and chiefly on a document, No. 2 of process, dated 19th November 1902, which bears to be a petition or form of a petition by the defender and pursuer to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire praying for certification in terms of section 2 of the Act 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 96, and that the petitioners had been married to each other, and for warrant to the registrar to enter the marriage in the register of marriages.

"This petition begins thus:—'We, Francis Duran, commission-agent, residing at 189 Hill Street, Garnethill, Glasgow, and Christina Sophia Keith or Morse, housekeeper, residing at 189 Hill Street aforesaid, do hereby accept and acknowledge each other as husband and wife.'

"This acknowledgment is signed by the parties and by two witnesses. The petition to the Sheriff follows, with the prayer, and they also are signed by the parties.

"The document is partly printed, and, so far as it is not printed, it was written (except the signatures) by Robert Watson, writer and notary-public, on the instruction of the parties. Although so signed, the petition was never presented to the Sheriff, and no warrant for registration of the marriage was obtained.

"The document includes, as has been seen, a perfectly explicit and unambiguous mutual acknowledgment of marriage, which makes certainly a most formidable beginning to the pursuer's case. The signatures are proved beyond any doubt, and the pursuer contends that as marriage is a contract constituted and completed by mutual consent, and requiring nothing else to complete it, the marriage in this case is established by the written unambiguous contract. The pursuer referred to Dalrymple, 16th July 1811, 2 Hag. 54, 107; MacAdam v. MacAdam, 1813, 1 Dow, 148, 189; Dysart Peerage Case, 6 A. C. 489, 543, 556; Imrie v. Imrie, 26th November 1891, 19 R. 185. If the question here had been as to the effect

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The evidence shewed here no marriage was intended by either party, but a mere form to satisfy the pursuer's demands. The onus was on the pursuer to shew that marriage was intended, however explicit the document founded on might be.[1] This onus she had failed to discharge. [LORD TRAYNER referred to Maloy v. Macadam.[2] The further citation of authorities was stopped by the Court.]

The pursuer and respondent argued that it was proved that she understood that she was being married, and was led into this belief by the defender. If so, it made no difference that the defender thought that the marriage was not binding.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

While the document constituting on the face of it an interchange of matrimonial consent cannot be accepted as conclusive proof of a marriage of an ordinary contract, it would have been very difficult to take off the effect of its explicit language by any amount of parole evidence. Such evidence would probably be at once ruled incompetent. But the contract of marriage has this great peculiarity that, to prove a marriage, it is not enough merely to table an express contract or declaration. It is necessary besides to shew the circumstances under which the contract was completed, and that these circumstances were consistent with the intention of the parties to contract marriage; and it is competent to prove that, however explicit its terms may be, the parties did not contemplate marriage, but entered into the apparent contract with some different object. What the parties said or wrote is not the chief point in such inquiries, but what they deliberately intended. This peculiarity of a contract expressive of marriage is well settled by decisions of the highest authority:—M'Innes v. More, 25th June 1782, 2 Pat. App. 598; Kello v. Taylor, 16th February 1787, 3 Pat. App. 56; Lockyer v. Sinclair, 3d March 1846, 8 D. 582, 596, 601; Fleming v. Corbet, June 24, 1859, 21 D. 1034, 1043-4; Robertson v. Steuart, 27th February 1874, 1 R. 532, reversed 7th June 1875, 2 R. (H. L.) 80. I think that in all these cases there was explicit consent, written or verbal; but marriage was not held to be constituted, because that was not the true intention of the parties.

"I think, however, that this latter rule must be taken with this qualification, that if a party uses words in an apparent contract expressive of his or her consent to marry, and intended to induce and inducing the other party to believe such consent, and inducing the other party to give her or his consent, then the former party will be precluded from denying that he did so consent. If a contract expressive of marriage be interchanged, and the one party sincerely intends marriage, then no mental reservation of the other party will prevent the result of marriage. The best exposition of this view of the law is, I think, contained in the Dysart Peerage Case, 6 A. C. 489.

"The pursuer maintains that the parties intended the constitution of marriage by the declaration. The defender, on the contrary, maintains that that was not contemplated, but only such a form of marriage as might be shewn to the pursuer's parents, and that marriage could not be completed until the declaration was produced to the Sheriff.

"It is therefore clear that it is necessary carefully to examine the whole without evidence of its being a true interchange of matrimonial consent, it is a contract which, if shewn to have been bona fide and with intention entered into, will establish a marriage by the law of Scotland.

The proof satisfies me that the pursuer entered into the contract with the intention of becoming the wife of the defender, and that in doing so she was in the belief, induced by the conduct of the defender, that he intended to do the same. Whether he really so intended, at first, and afterwards went back upon it, or whether he fraudulently led the pursuer to believe that he so intended, does not I think matter as regards the result. If she truly intended marriage, and the defender led her to believe that he was really marrying her, then he cannot now draw back. He cannot be allowed to say that he did not intend what he held himself out as intending.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The Lord Ordinary says that he has found this an exceptionally difficult case, and I agree with him; but after consideration of the evidence with the aid of the argument addressed to us, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor should be affirmed. The impression left on my mind by the evidence is that the pursuer, in the condition in which she found herself owing to her intercourse with the defender, was very anxious, both for the protection of her own good name, and for the sake of the child to which she was going to give birth, to become the wife of the defender, and that she urged this desire upon him. He consented circumstances under which the acknowledgment on which the pursuer relies was signed." (His Lordship here narrated the import of the evidence, ut supra.)

"I think there is very little more to be said. There is very little more evidence. The case rests mainly on these three documents, and the rest of the evidence seems neither to add to nor detract from their effect. There was little change in the mode of life of the pursuer and defender after their declaration of marriage. If the marriage was not completed by the declaration there is no room for the contention for marriage at any subsequent time. No evidence has been led that No. 11 of process was ever exhibited to the pursuer's parents, and neither of them gave evidence, which was perhaps not unnatural. But in truth the case has been practically left to depend on the three documents which I have considered, and I cannot resist the conclusion that they establish marriage. The defender's case seems to be rested on the mere idea that a man is not, in this question of marriage, bound to keep his word unless the marriage have the sanction of a magistrate or of a minister. That is not so. There is evidence that the defender was fully informed of his mistake, and he offers nothing but his own assertion in support of his averment.

"I am far from saying that the case is an easy one. I have found it very much the reverse, and it is not without great difficulty and misgiving that I hold that the pursuer has established her right to a judgment of declarator. There are other conclusions in the summons, but they were not argued; and, if a judgment is desired on them, they will require to be debated.

"No doubt the fact that the defender was a Spaniard has to be taken into consideration. It appeared to me that he understands the language well; but I do not doubt that he may not fully appreciate the customs of this country, in particular in regard to irregular marriages, but, in coming to a conclusion in favour of the pursuer, I have endeavoured to keep in view the disadvantage of the situation—of the defender as a foreigner."

to go through the form or ceremony of marriage which took place. I think the two singular documents to which the Lord Ordinary has referred may be explained on this view—which is the view I take of the evidence—that the defender intended to go through a form which would satisfy the pursuer's wishes, but which would not bind him. He did not intend to marry the pursuer, but to go through a form, short of marriage, which he thought would effect the objects which the pursuer had in view. On the other hand, I am quite satisfied that the defender led the pursuer to believe that he was marrying her, and that she honestly believed him and understood that she was being married. She intended marriage, and nothing short of that. If that is so, then, as your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary have said, it makes no difference that the defender did not intend marriage, it being the fact that he led the pursuer to believe he did.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I hold it to be distinctly proved that what passed between the pursuer and the defender on 19th November 1902 in Mr Watson's office constituted a valid marriage. It is distinctly proved that the pursuer so understood and intended. And in that view it is immaterial if the defender in his own mind resolved not to be bound by the contract, because that mental reservation, if it existed, was not communicated to the pursuer or to any of the parties present on that occasion.[1] I am by no means satisfied that the defender did not intend to marry the pursuer; he had compromised her, and she seems to have had sufficient influence with him to induce him to make this reparation. Again, it may be that after the marriage the defender thought that he saw his way to back out of the contract by not registering it, but that does not affect the question.

My opinion is that the defender knew quite well what he was about, and that he quite understood the explanations given by Mr Watson as to the law of the matter. His evidence and line of defence shew considerable cunning; and on the whole matter I think the defence is a shabby and unsuccessful attempt to back out of the contract which he had deliberately entered into.

other similar mechanical devices for the economy of steam in engines of various kinds while at work, but the application of this device to an engine at rest was a novelty, and the result attained—the economy of steam while the engine was at rest—had never been achieved before.

In a question with the holder of a patent of later date for a device, also designed to prevent the escape of steam from steam steering-engines when the engine was at rest, but using to obtain that result a stop valve worked in unison with the control valve by a steam relay instead of a stop valve worked by the direct mechanical action of the control valve, held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that B.'s patent was a master or pioneer patent, and that the new patent was an infringement.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

(ANTE, July 16, 1904, 6 F. 1001.)

In 1897 Andrew Betts Brown, engineer, Rosebank Iron Works, Edinburgh, took out a patent (No. 29,773) for improvements in the valves of steering and the like engines.

Steering-engines, actuated by steam, are constructed with a loosely fitting control valve. This has been found necessary in order that the steering apparatus may act quickly. The result necessarily is that when the engine is at rest there is a certain escape of steam from the control valve. This occasions a serious loss of steam power in ocean-going steamers when a straight course is steered for long distances, but it is necessary in order that the steering-engine may be ready to work at once in any emergency.

The object of Brown's patent was "the prevention of leakage of steam in steering and the like engines by the introduction into the steam feed-pipe of a casing which contains a cut-off valve, operated from and acting in unison with the controlling valve of the steering or like engine." The method by which the escape of steam was prevented was described by Brown in his specification in the following terms:—"For this purpose I fit in a passage or casing, through which the steam enters the controlling valve casing, a double-beat valve which has formed or fixed on it oppositely inclined surfaces, which are acted upon by counterpart inclines fitted in connection with the controlling valve, so that on the movement of the controlling valve it acts through the inclined surfaces to open the double-beat valve and admits steam." He added that "instead of the equilibrium valve" (i.e., the double-beat valve) "any equivalent device may be used."

Brown claimed,—"In connection with the valves of steering and like engines, fitting in a passage or casing through which the steam enters the controlling valve casing a double beat or equivalent valve having opposite inclines acted on by counterpart inclines moving with the controlling valve, the parts being arranged and operating substantially as and for the purposes hereinbefore described."

Brown's patent was largely used, and was a commercial success.

In 1903 Walter Graham took out a patent (No. 10,894) for an improvement in the construction and operation of the controlling valves of steam steering-engines. This patent, together with a patent for a similar purpose (No. 16,525 of 1902) granted to Robert Richardson, were acquired by John Hastie & Company, Limited, Kilblain Engine Works, Greenock, who proceeded to make and supply steering-engines fitted with the devices described in these two patents.

Andrew Betts Brown and Brown Brothers & Company, Limited, who were the owners of Brown's patent, brought the present action against Hastie & Company, concluding for declarator that the patents granted to Richardson and Graham were infringements of Brown's patent, for interdict against their use, and for damages. No. 17.

Nov. 18, 1904. Brown v. John Hastie & Co., Limited.

The pursuers' averments relative to the working of the defenders' patent were as follows:—"The mechanisms described in the said specifications, Nos. 16,525 of 1902 and 10,894 of 1903, are infringements of the pursuers' invention. They are themselves identical in principle and mode of working, and embody the substance of the pursuers' invention, so as to produce the same results in practically the same way by the substitution of well-known mechanical equivalents for certain parts of the pursuers' mechanism. The substance of the pursuers' invention is the operating of a cut-off valve by the action of the controlling valve of the steering-engine. Whenever the steersman operates the controlling valve to port or starboard the helm, that valve in turn operates the cut-off valve and admits steam to the steering-engines. The pursuers achieve this result by the direct action of the spindle of the controlling valve upon the end of the cut-off valve, which, for ease of lifting, is made a double-beat valve. Richardson and Graham in the said specifications substitute for the double-beat cut-off valve used by the pursuers a balanced cut-off valve, which is a well-known mechanical equivalent. On the spindle of their cut-off valve there is a piston working in a cylinder. Steam is admitted on both sides of this piston, and so the valve is balanced. This cut-off valve is operated from the controlling valve through the intervention of a small valve operated directly by the controlling valve. This small valve, in the case of Richardson's patent, is operated by the thrust of the end of the controlling valve spindle; and, in the case of Graham's patent, by an eccentric or lever working on the spindle of the controlling valve. When this small valve is opened the balance of the cut-off valve is destroyed, and the steam acting upon the piston opens the cut-off valve. This method of opening a balanced piston valve is old and well known; the modes of working the small valve from the controlling valve are mechanically the equivalents of those employed by the pursuers to lift their double-beat valve. The whole combination is a variation of the pursuers' invention complicated to produce an appearance of dissimilarity."

In their defences the defenders averred;—"The patent founded on by the pursuers and the patent founded on by the defenders both relate to steering and such like engines, and have the same object in view, viz., to save leakage of steam. This object is aimed at by every designer and maker of steam-engines. The patent of the defenders attains this object by different means and upon a different principle from those covered by the pursuers' patent. In the mechanism of the pursuers' patent the controlling valve of the steering-engine is fitted with inclined planes acting directly on corresponding inclines fitted on the stop valve. When the controlling valve is opened, the inclines on it bear upon those of the stop valve and open it, and when the controlling valve is returned to its neutral position the inclined planes on it are withdrawn from those on the stop valve and allow it to close. In the defenders' construction, the stop valve is placed in the steam-pipe, but instead of being operated by the control valve, it is operated by varying the steam pressure on the top side of the piston attached to the valve spindle. In this way the stop valve may be absolutely closed when the steering-engines are not required to operate, and that independently of the position of the control valve, which may remain more or less open without waste of steam."

John Hastie & Co., Limited.

Proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence was that while the use of a stop or cut-off valve working automatically in connection with the distributing valves of engines while at work was familiar to engineers, no one had anticipated Brown in applying such mechanism to prevent the escape of steam from an intermittent engine while at rest, and no other means for attaining this result had been suggested. The evidence was conflicting on the question whether the patents owned by Hastie & Company effected a greater saving of steam than that of Brown. It was admitted by Mr Dugald Clark, a scientific witness for the defenders, that a steam relay was at the date of Brown's patent a well-known method of opening valves.

On 25th March 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Further, decerns and ordains the defenders to deliver up to the pursuers all mechanisms or parts thereof in their possession constructed in accordance with the specifications Nos. 16,525 (1902) and 10,894 (1903), in breach of the pursuers' letters-patent No. 29,773 (1897), and to pay to the pursuers the sum of £300 in name of damages: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers in this case are proprietors of a patent dated in 1897, which relates to improvements in connection with the valves of steering and like engines; and speaking generally, the improvement which the patentee claims may be said to consist in a certain contrivance for stopping, or reducing to a minimum, the waste of steam formerly found inevitable, during the periods (constantly recurring and often prolonged) when the steering engine is at rest, but when, nevertheless, there exists a constant pressure of steam upon, and consequent leakage through, the controlling valve of the engine.

"There is no dispute as to the merit and novelty of the invention. The question is simply as to an alleged infringement by the defenders, who are said to make, sell, or use certain similar apparatus, having the same object, for which they hold certain patents of subsequent date. And, as not infrequently happens, the controversy comes really to turn on the construction of the specification filed with reference to the pursuers' patent, dated, as I have said, in the year 1897.

"The pursuers contend that on the just construction of that specification, read, as it falls to be read, with reference to the state of prior knowledge, the essence and substance of the invention consisted in the introduction for the first time into steering engines of what I may call a separate stop valve formed in the steam casing through which the steam enters the controlling valve; this stop valve being arranged to move in unison with the controlling valve, by means of suitable mechanism, one form of which the patentee fully describes.

"The defenders, on the other hand, say that the pursuers' patent, properly construed, is a patent only for the particular method described of actuating the stop valve, viz.—The motion of opposite inclines fitted on the stop valve, acted upon by counterpart inclines fitted on the controlling valve. On that assumption they say, and I think truly, that their (the defenders') apparatus (the alleged infringing apparatus) actuates the stop valve in a different way, viz., indirectly by variations of steam pressure, instead of directly by the direct mechanical contact of counter inclines. And that being so, they contend that there is no room in this case for what is called the doctrine of mechanical equivalents—a doctrine which applies only where, the essence of an invention being taken, some part of the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—This was not a case of a pioneer patent, i.e., of a patent for an entirely new invention. Here the object aimed at, i.e., the prevention of leakage of steam by a mechanical device working automatically, was not new; and the method of attaining it, by a cut-off valve actuated by the controlling valve, was not new either. The novelty was to carry out the familiar idea, by the familiar means, in circumstances to which they had not hitherto been applied. The sole merit of Brown's invention was to save steam when an engine was at rest by a means which was familiar to engineers as applied to an engine at work. That did not involve the degree of originality and novelty which was necessary to constitute the patent a pioneer or master patent, and therefore to exclude the result attained from the field open to inventors. In all the cases in which the claim to a master patent had been sustained there had been either a new idea or a new method.[1] The present case fell described mechanism—essential to its working, but not an essential part of the invention—has substituted for it by the alleged infringer some known different but equivalent mechanism, to produce the same result.

"It is, I think, clear that the question thus sharply raised cannot be solved upon the mere language of the specification, or of the specification and claim. It has first to be ascertained what, having regard to the state of prior knowledge, was the field open to the inventor; and how far what I may call his total apparatus was at its date new—new particularly in the sense of achieving a new and important result. In other words, it is necessary to know whether the invention was what has been called a 'pioneer' or 'master' invention, or was only in truth a new and improved mode of achieving an already achieved result. It is obvious, and has been repeatedly decided, that in determining what is essential and what is not, that is always a most important, and generally a crucial consideration—(Consolidated Car Heating Company v. Came, L. R., App. Cases, [1903], p. 516, and cases there cited).

"Now, it appears to me to be the just result of the evidence that the pursuers' invention was of the former class, and not of the latter. Steering-engines were, of course, well known in 1897. And in such engines there were, of course, besides the usual distributing valves near the cylinder, what was known as a controlling valve—a valve which, being operated by the usual hand wheel, determines the passage of the steam in different directions, according as it is desired to move the helm to port or to starboard; and which, as each motion is completed, comes back to its neutral position, and thus, at least theoretically, shuts off steam for the time. The difficulty, however, was, that this controlling valve was necessarily loose. It had to be sensitive and to work easily, and it could not therefore be tight. Hence leakage and consequent waste of steam was inevitable, and in large vessels was serious; and at the date of the pursuers' patent no method had been devised, or even proposed, for curing this leakage—this waste of steam—when the engine was not at work. In particular, it had not occurred to anybody that the problem might be solved by the introduction of a separate valve—a separate stop valve, working automatically in connection with the controlling valve, and which, while leaving the latter valve loose, was in itself absolutely tight. Of course stop valves and cut-off valves were old and well-known contrivances. So also as applied to ordinary engines (continuous going engines like locomotives) were cut-off valves working auto-rather within the cases where the method employed by the patentee was protected, but others were not precluded from arriving at the same result by different methods.[1]

(2) Even if it were admitted that Brown's patent was a pioneer patent, it would be going beyond the authorities to hold that the defenders had infringed. On the evidence they had attained a result not reached by Brown—a higher percentage of steam saved, and they had attained this by new means. That result might have been present to Brown's mind, but was not in his specification, and there could be no infringement of the equity of a patent.[2]

Argued for the respondents;—This was a case of a master or pioneer patent, because the invention patented by Brown achieved an object which had never been achieved before. Prior to that invention, the mechanical devices for economising steam by preventing waste had all been applicable to engines continuously at work, and to those matically. They were used for promoting economy of steam, or more effective expansion of steam when the engines were working. But it had not occurred to anybody to use either a stop or cut-off valve in connection, not with the ordinary distributing valves common to all engines, but with the controlling valve peculiar to steering-engines; or to use such valve for the purpose, not of economising steam when the engine was working, but of preventing the waste of steam when it was not working. It was left for the pursuer, Mr Brown, to make for the first time this new and useful application of the automatic stop valve, and by doing so, to achieve a result which was much desiderated, and has been a great commercial success.

"Plainly, therefore, it must, I think, be taken that the pursuers' invention was, in the most real sense, what is called a 'pioneer' invention. It was not of the kind in controversy in such cases as Curtis v. Platt, 3 Ch. Div. 135, or Dudgeon v. Thomson, 3 App. Cases, 34. It belonged, on the contrary, to the class of patented inventions which were the subject of such cases as Proctor v. Bennis, L. R., 36 Ch. Div. 740; Thomsen v. Moore, 6 P. C. 426, 7 P. C. 325; Aktiebolaget Separator Company v. Dairy Outfit Company, 1898, 15 P. C. 327.

"Having this in view, the question at issue is really this, Whether it can be held, on the fair reading of the pursuers' patent, that having in fact made this new and valuable invention, he (the patentee) has yet for some reason claimed only—or what comes to the same thing, put forward as the essential or an essential part of his protected invention—the particular mode which he describes, of actuating his stop valve by the action of counter inclines. Of course such a thing is possible. The patentee may have failed to recognise the true nature of his discovery, or he may have so expressed his specification as to make the suggested reading inevitable. But the question is whether that is so, or whether reading the specification fairly, and in the light of the state of knowledge at the time, it is not sufficiently manifest that the invention described and claimed is just the invention which the patentee made.

"Now, as to this, all I can say is, that I see no sufficient ground for reading the specification in the narrow sense for which the defenders con-only. They had never been applied to an engine at rest, and their application to such engines constituted a distinct mechanical advance, and was a pioneer patent because it was a new invention and not merely a development or improvement on an old one. A pioneer patent might be obtained although the central idea was not new, and although the result was obtained by means familiar to experts, if that familiarity simply meant, as it did in the reclaimers' argument, that these means had been used by other inventors to obtain other results.[1] Thus in Moore v. Thomson,[2] a new kind of mariner's compass—in Proctor v. Bennis,[3] a device for the automatic feeding of furnaces—by mechanical means already known for other purposes, had been held to be of the nature of pioneer patents. If then Brown's invention was a pioneer patent, it was clear that the patents obtained by the reclaimers were infringements. The evidence shewed that they were merely devices for obtaining the same result by a variation in the mechanical means. It was well established that that constituted an infringement.[4] The cases of Gwynne v. Drysdale & Company,[5] and Consolidated Car Heating Company v. Came,[6] on which the re-tend. It may be true that it would have been better, as it certainly would have been quite easy, for the framer of the specification to state expressly that while fully describing, as he required to do, an effective method of actuating the stop valve, he did not confine himself to that method, but only to that or some equivalent method. But that is, I am afraid, an observation which might be made in most patent cases which come before the Courts. It is the leaving of things to implication which, as a rule, makes construction necessary. And applying here what I conceive to be proper principles of construction, I have, on the whole, come to the conclusion that the pursuers' construction of the specification is the correct one. I consider that the essential feature—the essence and substance—of the patented invention consists simply in the application to steering and the like engines, for the purpose of preventing leakage of steam while the engine is not working, of a separate stop valve working in unison with the controlling valve. And as it is not disputed, or at least is clear, that the defenders' apparatus embraced those elements and employed them for the same purpose and with the same result, I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to judgment.

"With regard to damages, that is, of course, a jury question. The actual profit made by the defenders, and presumably lost to the pursuers, upon the manufacture and sale of the ten valves specified, seems to have been about £100. Something, however, must be added in respect of profit presumably lost to the pursuers by the defenders obtaining the orders for the steering engines fitted with the pursuers' valves, which orders, it is said, would, but for the defenders' competition, have come to the pursuers. It seems to be decided that this is a legitimate element to be considered, and the pursuers claim in respect of it an additional sum of £600. I think, however, this is excessive, inasmuch as it assumes as a certainty what was hardly of that character. I think I shall do justice sufficiently by fixing the total damage at £300."

claimers relied, were cases of the class of Curtis v. Platt,[1] where the patent alleged to have been infringed was merely an adaptation or combination of known means to obtain a known result. In such cases it was no doubt held that alternative methods were not protected, but these cases had no bearing on the present. Even if it were to be held that Brown's patent was not of the class of pioneer patents, the patents used by the reclaimers were infringements, under the rule laid down by the Lord President (Inglis) in Gwynne v. Drysdale & Company,[2] to the effect that it constituted infringement in all cases if the new inventor merely substituted some mechanical equivalent in an immaterial part of the patented invention.

On the question of damages the respondents accepted the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary.[3]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The invention of the pursuer in this case had for its object so to control the apparatus for passing steam into ship-steering engines that escape and waste of steam might be prevented when the engine was at rest, the use of the engine being necessarily intermittent, as it was only intended to run when the ship's helm required to be altered. It had been found necessary, in the case of the control valves of ships' steering apparatus, that the valves should not be tight in their seating, as otherwise there might be great risk of danger from the steering apparatus not being set in motion the instant it was necessary to do so, and as it was plain that if a steering apparatus control valve should remain fast when it was desired to move it, the most disastrous consequences might ensue. The pursuer's invention consisted in so associating a cut-off valve with the control valve, that when the control valve was in the neutral position, the cut-off valve was closed and the passage of steam into the casing of the control valve stopped, thus preventing escape of steam past the loose fitting control valve.

I am satisfied upon the evidence that this was a new invention, to effect a purpose which had not been effected by any previous apparatus. It is true that in some earlier devices a cut-off arrangement had been used to modify the effect of steam pressure in the casing so that at certain points in the stroke of the engine piston the pressure should not be so great as at other parts of the stroke. In one case this was done to give greater freedom to the slide valves admitting the steam into the cylinders, at the moment at which these slide valves were being moved in their seats by the eccentric. In another case a cut-off was used to check the entrance of steam into the cylinder at a certain stage of the stroke, so as to allow the steam already in the cylinder to expand. But these devices did not act with the purpose of stopping all flow of steam into the control valve casings when the engine was not in motion, they only controlled the steam which was passing in by the open control valve. The pursuer's arrangement had a different purpose —the exclusion of steam from the control valve casing when the engine was not working.

[3] United Horse Shoe and Nail Co. v. Stewart & Co., March 12, 1888 15 R. (H. L.) 45.

In my opinion the pursuer secured a master patent for effecting a useful purpose which had not been previously effected. That being so, the question is whether the defenders' apparatus, intended to effect the same purpose, is an infringement of the patent of the pursuer.

The pursuer in his apparatus, as he applies it in practice, uses a sliding control valve. Upon its shaft he places two slopes or slides, with a horizontal space between their lower ends. In this horizontal space when the control valve is closed, there rests the end of a valve, which, when it is in that position, shuts off the steam from entering the valve casing. When the control valve is moved so as to open the passage to the engine, one of the slides pushes the cut-off valve out of its seat, and thus allows the steam into the control valve casing, and so on to the engine. On the control valve being brought back to zero, the cut-off valve once more comes into action and stops the passage of steam into the casing.

The defenders' arrangement consists of a rocking valve, which, by being turned to one side or other, opens a port to admit steam to one end or other of the cylinder. Upon the spindle of this valve there is an eccentric, the rod from which closes a valve in a small pipe, into which steam can enter, and which steam holds a cut-off valve in the closed position, the steam from the boiler pressing equally on both sides of the valve. When the control valve is moved the eccentric is also moved, with the effect that the small pipe which was full of steam has a port opened to the air, and the pressure being thus relieved from one side of the cut-off valve, it is opened, and the steam to drive the engine is free to pass on by the control valve to the cylinder. On the control valve being again turned to the neutral position, the small pipe is again sealed, and the steam entering it under pressure the cut-off valve is once more held in position, and steam shut off from the control valve casing.

It appears to me that the apparatus of the defenders is only an equivalent for that of the pursuers', effecting the same purpose by well-known means, and only substituting one detail device for another, without any real difference.

On the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary in his reading of the pursuer's specification, and in holding that the pursuers had established their claim against the defenders as infringers of their rights under their patents. As regards the question of damages, I do not see any sufficient ground for interfering with the Lord Ordinary's decision on that matter.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. The validity of the pursuers' patent is not in dispute. The question is, has it been infringed by the defenders? I agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it has.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with and adopt the reasons clearly and concisely given by the Lord Ordinary.

The novelty and value of the pursuers' invention being indisputable, the only question is whether the defenders' specification constitutes an infringement of it.

I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships that it does.

The grain store was a "warehouse" within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.

Held that the purchasers were not "occupiers" of the store in the sense of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, sec. 104, and that the dependants of a carter in their employment, who was killed by the fall of a bag while taking delivery of part of the peas at the store, were not entitled to compensation from his employers under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

THIS was an appeal upon a case stated by the Sheriff-substitute at Paisley (Lyell), in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, between Mrs Annie Adam or Mackie, 3 Kilnside Road, Paisley, as an individual, and as tutor of her pupil children, claimant and respondent, and J. & R. Ramsay, Seedhill Mills, Paisley, appellants.

The facts found proved by the Sheriff-substitute were as follows:—"On 11th March 1904 the appellants bought in the Corn Exchange, Glasgow, from Messrs John Jackson & Company, grain importers, Glasgow, 200 bolls of peas, which peas formed portion of a larger parcel of about 600 bolls belonging to Messrs Jackson, and then lying in bulk at the store of Mr William Finlay, warehouseman, 87 Lancefield Street, Glasgow. This store is a building of considerable size, exclusively devoted to the business of warehousing grain in bulk and bags for brokers and wholesale houses, and a notice under the Factory and Workshops Act is exhibited in the building. At the time when the contract of sale was made the appellants, who are grain millers in Paisley, received from Messrs Jackson, the sellers, a delivery order entitling them forthwith to take delivery of the said 200 bolls at the said store, but by custom of trade and under the rules of the Glasgow Corn Trade Association, in accordance with which the contract was entered into, the appellants might take delivery in such instalments as they might from time to time require within fourteen days from the date of the sale, during which time the appellants were not liable for storage, and the goods lay in the store at the risk of the sellers. Goods such as these when sold ex store are proportionately dearer than goods ex quay, the difference in price being exacted to cover, inter alia, the seller's liability for storage during the said fourteen days. On the 19th and 21st of March respectively the appellants took delivery of a portion of the peas, and on the 22d March they sent the late Joseph Mackie, husband of the respondent, who was then a carter in their employment, to take delivery of 31 bags of the said peas. The peas were shovelled into bags by the servants of the warehouseman, Mr Finlay, from the bulk that was lying on the floor of the third storey of the store, and the full bags were then lowered, also by the servants of Mr Finlay, by means of a sling, to the lorry standing on the street below, where the deceased Joseph Mackie was receiving them. In the course of the operations one of the full bags slipped either from the sling or the window, crushed Mackie beneath its weight and killed him."

The Sheriff-substitute held "that the property in the 200 bolls of peas passed to the appellants when the contract was made, that the store is a warehouse within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, that on the 22d March 1904 the appellants were persons having the actual use of the portion of the warehouse where their peas were stored, and therefore must be deemed occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the 104th section of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and as such occupiers the undertakers within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, section 7, and therefore liable in compensation." *

The questions of law were, inter alia, as follows:—"(2) Is the said store a warehouse within the meaning of the statutes? (3) If so, were the appellants on 22d March 1904 persons having the actual use of the warehouse, and as such occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the 104th section of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901? (4) If so, were the appellants on the occasion libelled undertakers within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, section 7 (2)?"

The appellants, Messrs Ramsay, ultimately conceded that the store was a warehouse in the sense of section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and that the second question must be answered in the affirmative.

Argued for the appellants;—The property in the peas did not pass to the appellants until separation of their 200 bolls from the mass of 600 bolls, the property now passing when the periculum passed under the old law.[1] Here no peas had been appropriated to the Section 7 (2)—"'Factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also includes any . . . warehouse . . . to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. . . . appellants' contract. If the respondent's contention were correct then any person who had a personal right to come and demand a quantity of goods from a mass would be liable to the penalties provided by the Factory Act for any infringement of the regulations with regard to warehouses. That was an absurd result. Such a person had no control of the conduct of the warehouse. A person having the "actual use or occupation" of a warehouse[1] meant a person who had the use and occupation of the whole warehouse, or at least of a definite area within it for a continuous period. The use of the word "premises" shewed that there must be occupation of a definitely bounded portion of the warehouse. If the appellants were not occupiers of a warehouse in the sense of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, sec. 104, then they were not "undertakers" in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 7, and they were not liable in compensation to the respondent.

Argued for the respondent;—The Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, sec. 104, contemplated more than one person being the occupier of a warehouse. Any person who had goods stored in a warehouse had the "actual use or occupation" of it, and was consequently an "occupier" of it within the meaning of section 104. Part of the peas here belonged to the appellants. Separation of their part was not necessary. But even if it were, for a brief period part of the peas was in the warehouse after separation as the appellants' property.

Lord President.—The questions involved in this case are short, but after considering them with the aid of the able argument of counsel I think it is impossible to uphold the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. There are four questions altogether, but it is not necessary that the first should be answered, and it is conceded by the appellants that the second question must be answered in the affirmative. The third question is as follows:—(His Lordship read the third question.)

The appellants bought from Messrs Jackson, grain importers, Glasgow, 200 bolls of peas, which were a portion of a larger parcel of 600 bolls belonging to them and were then lying in bulk in the store of Mr William Finlay. No peas were separated from the mass and set aside for the appellants or otherwise appropriated to their contract. They had not right to any particular peas, but merely a right to receive delivery of 200 bolls out of a mass. The peas were shovelled into bags by the servants of the warehouseman from the mass lying on the floor of the warehouse, and lowered by a sling to a lorry on the street below, where the deceased Joseph Mackie was receiving them. One of the full bags slipped either from the sling or the window and crushed Mackie to death.

When the accident happened the peas were still in the hands of the servants of the warehouseman and had not been delivered to the appellants. It thus becomes necessary to consider the application of section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, to the circumstances of the case. (His Lordship read the 104th section.) The question therefore comes to be, whether the appellants were at the time of the accident occupiers of the warehouse within the meaning of section 104. I am clearly of opinion that they were not. The appellants had not at the time of the accident received delivery of the peas contained in the bag which slipped. These peas were still in the hands of the warehouseman by his servants, and they were not lowering them as the property of the appellants, but of the sellers, and they would not become the property of the appellants until they were delivered to and accepted by them.

The result, in my opinion, is that the third question, whether the appellants were occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Act must be answered in the negative. The only person other than the keeper of the warehouse who could in any reasonable sense be said to be in the actual use and occupation of the store was the owner of the peas. If 200 bolls had been set apart for and accepted by the appellants in the warehouse so that the warehouseman was keeping these particular bags of peas for the appellants, I could have understood the contention of the respondent. But as matters actually stood it appears to me that the appellants were not occupiers of the warehouse at the time of the accident. I therefore think the Sheriff-substitute has erred, and that the 3d and 4th questions should be answered in the negative.

LORD M'LAREN.—The injury or cause of action out of which the proceedings have taken shape was that the husband of the respondent lost his life by a bag of peas falling upon him from the window of a warehouse while he was engaged in taking delivery. The accident was a sad one, and happened to a man whose employment did not involve risk. It suggests that someone was to blame, and I understand the question of responsibility is to be sifted in another proceeding. In this proceeding it is not necessary to allege fault against anyone. The Workmen's Compensation Act gives a workman a claim to compensation against his employer on certain conditions, and the only question is whether the workman in this case is within the conditions. An endeavour has been made to bring this case within section 7 of the Act of 1897, it being pointed out that for certain purposes a warehouse is a factory. Section 7 (2) enacts that "factory" includes any "warehouse" to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. This is the first element in the construction of the statute for the purposes of the case. The second element is that the word "undertakers" as used in section 7 (1) is defined in section 7 (2) to mean, in the case of a factory, the occupier thereof within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts. With these definitions in view we come to the concrete question, whether in the sense of the Compensation Act and the Factory Acts the employer of a carter who was sent to a warehouse to take delivery of the peas sold to him is to be regarded as the occupier or an occupier of the warehouse within which the bags of peas were stored. While the language is wide in order to prevent evasion, yet "occupier" plainly means the person who runs the factory or warehouse, who regulates and controls the work that is done there, and who is responsible for the fulfilment of the provisions of the Factory Act within it. This cannot be predicated of a person who had a mere casual interest in the warehouse by being the owner or purchaser of a parcel of goods stored in the warehouse.

Ramsay v. Mackie.

In my reading of the statute it would make no difference—I speak with all due reserve—whether the injured man was employed by the seller or the purchaser of the goods to take them away. I am clearly of opinion that a person who merely gets the ordinary trade use of a warehouse for storing his goods in it is not an occupier of the warehouse in the sense of the Act of Parliament. That would make absolute nonsense of the Act, and therefore I come very clearly to be of opinion that the representatives of this workman had no claim against his employer on the ground that he was occupier of a factory.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with your Lordship that as this was a sale of unascertained goods the property could not pass until specific goods of the description purchased were unconditionally appropriated to the contract.

But the question which we have to determine does not so much depend on the relation of the buyer and the seller as on the relation of the buyer to the warehouseman.

We are told that Messrs Jackson, who were the owners of 600 bolls of peas then lying in bulk at the store of Mr Finlay, sold part of them and handed to the purchaser a delivery order for the part sold. The purchaser had thus no interest whatever in the warehouse, and no concern with the warehouseman except that he held a delivery order on presentation of which he would be entitled to demand delivery of a certain quantity of peas to be taken out of a larger quantity held by the warehouseman for the vendor. In the meantime the peas stored in the warehouse do not belong to the purchaser, he is not liable to pay the storage rent, and he has no contract of any description with the warehouseman. I am quite unable to see that he is in any intelligible sense the occupier of the warehouse. But the Sheriff finds that he was the occupier in order to shew that as the occupier of the warehouse he was occupier of a factory within the meaning of the Factory Acts, and therefore liable as the undertaker within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act for injuries suffered in or about the warehouse. But the specific ground on which the Sheriff holds that the appellants are undertakers is that they are occupiers within the definition of section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. If that is sound, all the provisions of the Act for the use of dangerous machines, for the prevention of accidents, and for the regulation of dangerous trades are imposed, not upon persons having any kind of superintendence or control of a factory or its machinery, but upon anybody who happens to present a delivery order, and it follows that these unfortunate customers of the customers of the warehouse must be made liable in the statutory fines for non-performance of the statutory duties imposed upon them. I think it quite impossible to hold anything of the kind.

I have no doubt therefore that the Sheriff's decision must be altered, and that the judgment proposed by your Lordship is right.

Murdochs v. Inland Revenue.

ALEXANDER MURDOCH AND GEORGE BAIN MURDOCH, Appellants.—Younger.
INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Dundas—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Inhabited House Duty—Two houses belonging to different owners connected so as to form one dwelling-house—Inhabited House Duty Act, 1808 (48 Geo. III. cap. 55), Schedule B, Rule 14.—The Inhabited House Duty Act, 1808, enacts, Schedule B, Rule 14,—"Where any dwelling-house shall be divided into different tenements, being distinct properties, every such tenement shall be subject to the same duties as if the same was an entire house, which duties shall be paid by the occupiers thereof respectively."

A and B, two adjoining dwelling-houses belonging to different proprietors, were connected by an open doorway on the ground floor. The proprietor of A, and his son, the tenant of B, occupied the two houses thus:—The son, who was a physician, occupied the public rooms in B for his practice, one bedroom in B was occupied by himself, and another by a sister. The father and the other members of the family had bedrooms in A. The whole family took their meals in A. The only kitchen used was in A. There was only one servant.

Held that there was such internal communication between these two houses that they could not be regarded as "different tenements" in the sense of Schedule B, Rule 14, of the Inhabited House Duty Act, 1808; that the two houses formed one dwelling-house in the joint occupation of father and son; and therefore that the father and son were jointly liable to inhabited house duty for the whole premises.

1st DIVISION. Exchequer Cause.

ALEXANDER MURDOCH, librarian, Glasgow, and George Bain Murdoch, doctor of medicine, Glasgow, appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income-Tax and Inhabited House Duty Acts for the Lower Ward of the county of Lanark, against an assessment made upon them for inhabited house duty for the year 1902-3 on £97, the annual value of Nos. 25 and 27 Bank Street, Hillhead, Glasgow, of which they were the occupiers.

The following were the facts as found or admitted:—"1. (a) No. 25 Bank Street belongs to the appellant Alexander Murdoch and his wife, No. 27 Bank Street belongs to George Bain. In 1900 George Bain and the appellant George Bain Murdoch verbally agreed, the first named to let, and the second named to take, No. 27 Bank Street for 5½ years from Martinmas 1900, at the yearly rent of £40. The tenancy of the appellant George Bain Murdoch subsisted during the year of assessment. The appellant George Bain Murdoch is a nephew of George Bain and a son of the appellant Alexander Murdoch.

"(b) Nos. 25 and 27 Bank Street are dwelling-houses of three storeys each, basement, ground floor, and first floor. When originally built they were two distinct and independent though adjoining dwelling-houses. There is now, and has been for the last three years, internal communication between them by means of a doorway made in the separating wall of the houses. The doorway, which is without a door, is on the ground floor, is 6 feet 6 inches in height and 3 feet in width, and gives access from the lobby of No. 25 to a pantry in No. 27, which is entered by a door from the lobby of No. 27. The houses were separately assessed to inhabited house duty for the years prior to the year 1902-1903, the Assessor being unaware of the houses having been internally connected by means of the doorway.

"(c) The appellant Alexander Murdoch and the members of his family, other than the appellant George Bain Murdoch and a daughter, sleep in No. 25 Bank Street. The appellant George Bain Murdoch and the daughter referred to sleep in No. 27 Bank Street. The public rooms of No. 27 Bank Street are used by the appellant George Bain Murdoch for the purposes of his practice as a doctor. The appellant Alexander Murdoch and all the members of his family, including the appellant George Bain Murdoch and the daughter referred to, take their meals in No. 25 Bank Street.

"(d) Only one servant is kept for both houses. Her wages are paid by the appellant Alexander Murdoch. The meals of all the inmates of Nos. 25 and 27 Bank Street are cooked in the kitchen of No. 25 Bank Street. The kitchen of No. 27 is not used as a kitchen."

On these facts the Commissioners, after hearing parties, "found, on the evidence submitted to them, that Nos. 25 and 27 Bank Street formed, in their present state, one dwelling-house, which is in the joint occupation of the appellants, Alexander Murdoch and George Bain Murdoch, and were accordingly of opinion that the assessment for inhabited house duty in respect of Nos. 25 and 27 Bank Street should be made on the appellants, Alexander Murdoch and George Bain Murdoch, jointly and in one sum. The Commissioners fixed the assessment at £92, being the cumulo amount of (a) the amount (£47) of the assessment for income-tax made in respect of No. 25 Bank Street, and (b) the amount (£45) to which the assessment for income-tax made in respect of No. 27 Bank Street was reduced on appeal."

Alexander Murdoch and George Bain Murdoch required the Commissioners to state a case, which they did, setting forth the facts given above.

Argued for the appellants;—There were here two separate houses; or, if one house, it was "divided into different tenements, being separate properties," and came under Rule 14 of Schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55.* In Campbell v. Inland Revenue[1] there was only one owner of both tenements. Here there were two different owners. The two houses were structurally separate and distinct, and the communicating door did not make them one dwelling-house.[2] The two houses were separately owned, let, and occupied, and it was no business of the Assessor to inquire whether or how often the two families visited each other or dined together. The cases quoted on the other side dealt with the exemption of business premises under Rule 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878,† and were not in point.

Argued for the respondents;—The only rule which applied to the present case was Schedule B, Rule 1, of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55,‡ which imposed the duty on the actual occupier or occupiers. Separate ownership or tenancy made no difference. This was not the case of a dwelling-house divided into different tenements, but of two houses united into one, and therefore Rule 14 of Schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55,* did not apply. The existence of internal communication had always been regarded as important in questions of this kind.[1] Here the means of communication between the two houses was so complete as to make them one dwelling-house for assessment purposes.[2] No doubt some of these cases dealt with the exemption of business premises under section 13 of the Act of 1878,[3] but the same phrase "different tenements" was used in that section, and had been interpreted in the way now contended for. The case was a fortiori of Brown v. Furtado,[4] because there was here not merely access between the two houses but complete joint occupation and one establishment.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case relates to the mode in which Nos. 25 and 27 Bank Street, Glasgow, should be assessed for inhabited house duty.—(His Lordship stated the facts set forth in the case.)

I am of opinion that the decision of the Commissioners is right. Although the two houses were originally separate and independent structures, separately occupied, they have ceased to be so by the opening of the doorway, which always remains a free and open channel of communication between them, and by both houses being occupied in common by the appellants and their respective families, just as if they were one family. This one inhabited house has not been divided into separate "tenements" in the sense of the Acts. No part of the house is a separate tenement, so as to be exempted from inhabited house duty on the ground of its being a "tenement occupied solely for the purposes of trade or business" under subsection 2 of section 13 of the Act of 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 15, or upon any other ground.

LORD ADAM.—The first question in this case is whether, for the purposes of the Act, Nos. 25 and 27 Bank Street, Glasgow, are to be treated as one single dwelling-house? Now, that appears to me to be a question of fact, and it depends on the structural condition of these premises at the date of assessment. I do not think that there is any conflict in this inquiry as to what the state of these buildings was. The houses were originally separate houses, but their present condition is this—that a doorway has been opened through the partition wall which formerly divided the two houses. The result is that there is internal communication all over these two houses from the one to the other, and that internal communication in its present state cannot be cut off, because there is no door or anything of that sort in the doorway to prevent such communication. That being the condition of these houses, I do not doubt that they are, in the sense of the Act, one dwelling-house, and should be so considered. Well, then, the next question is, how are they occupied? The one house, No. 25, belongs to Alexander Murdoch, and the other house, No. 27, is rented by George Bain Murdoch, the other appellant. Now, the way they are occupied is this: Alexander Murdoch and his family, except a daughter and the other appellant, sleep in No. 25. His son, the other appellant, George Bain Murdoch, and the daughter referred to, sleep in No. 27, and the public rooms of No. 27 are used by George Bain Murdoch in his practice as a physician, but all the rest of the premises, as it appears to me, is used and occupied in common. That is the only separate occupation. The families take their meals in common. One kitchen, that of No. 25, is used for preparing these meals. There is only one servant for both families, and in every respect, except what I have stated, these premises are used in common. That being so, is that a joint occupation or is it a separate occupation? It humbly appears to me that the conclusion at which the Commissioners of Income-Tax have arrived is right, and that this is not a separate occupation, but a joint occupation. I do not think it makes any difference in the matter of fact as to joint occupation that the one house belongs to the one appellant and the other house is held by a tenant. If that be so, I think that is an end to the case. But we were referred to Rules 6 and 14 of the Act of 48 Geo. III. c. 55, Schedule B, which it is said may be construed into a different determination. I do not think it necessary to read these rules at length, because I find in the case of Campbell v. Inland Revenue [1] that an exposition by the late Lord President Inglis of the true meaning and effect of these rules is there set forth. I entirely agree with it, and cannot express it in better language. What he says is this:—"What is the provision of Rule 6, and what is the provision of Rule 14, taking the two together? It simply comes to this, that where a dwelling-house, meaning an entire block of building, is the property of one individual, but is divided into different occupations or tenements let to different tenants, the landlord or owner of the entire block of building is to be taken as the occupier of the entire block of building, and assessed as if he occupied the whole himself." Now, this is not a case of only one owner, and it is not a case in my view, and in your Lordship's view, of a separation into distinct tenements, and therefore it is not one falling under Rule 6. Then he goes on to say under Rule 14,—"but where the entire block of building is divided into tenements in the same manner as is contemplated by the sixth section"—that is, distinct tenements—"but these tenements are distinct properties belonging to different owners, then the incidence of the duty is to be upon the occupant of each separate tenement." But, in my opinion, and, I understand, in your Lordships', this is not a case where the dwelling-house in question is divided into distinct tenements or separate tenements, and Rule 14 does not apply. For these reasons I agree with your Lordship that the determination of the Commissioners is right, and should be affirmed.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

[1] 7 R. 579.

No. 19.

Nov. 22, 1904.
Murdochs v. Inland Revenue.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also concur. In this case the two houses were originally separate, and were thrown into one by the opening up of a communication, which, according to the structure of the building, cannot be closed without structural alterations. If the mode of occupation were material to the question, the building is occupied by one family, with one servant. It seems to me immaterial that one of the rooms is set apart for the separate use of the son for the purposes of his profession, because the fact that one person living in family with others in one house has a separate sitting-room does not make the house in which he lives with others two houses. It still remains one house. I agree with Lord Adam that the rules relied upon do not apply, because this is not a case of one entire block of buildings separated into distinct tenements.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners, and sustained the assessment.

ROBERT ADDIE & SONS' COLLIERIES, LIMITED, Appellants.—Salvesen, K.C.—Hunter.
MRS MARGARET DOCHERTY OR TRAINER, Respondent.—Watt, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 7 (2) (b), and First Schedule 1 (a)—Dependants—Dependence in law or fact.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, confers a right to compensation upon those who were wholly or partially dependent on a workman who has sustained fatal injuries in the course of his employment, and defines dependants as (sec. 7, subsec. 2 (b)) "in Scotland such of the persons entitled according to the law of Scotland to sue the employer for damages or solatium in respect of the death of the workman as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death."

In a claim by a widow for compensation for the death of her son it was proved that the applicant was, at the date of the death, undergoing a sentence of confinement in a State Reformatory for Inebriates, that during the four years preceding she had been in prison with the exception of ten months, and that during that period she had occasionally earned a little by outdoor work, but was otherwise entirely dependent upon her son, who had contributed 5s. or 6s. a week towards her support.

Held that the applicant was not wholly or partially dependent on her son's earnings at the time of his death within the meaning of the Act, and compensation refused.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Airdrie, between Mrs Margaret Docherty or Trainer, claiming compensation for the death of her son, Thomas Trainer, miner, and Robert Addie & Sons' Collieries, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (A. O. M. Mackenzie) found that the applicant was entirely dependent on the earnings of her deceased son at the time of his death, and awarded compensation.

In a case stated for appeal he found the following facts admitted or proved:—"(4) That the applicant is fifty-five years old, and is a widow, and that the deceased Thomas Trainer was her only child, and was unmarried. (5) That at the date of the said Thomas Trainer's death the applicant was confined in the State Reformatory for Inebriates at Perth, having been sentenced in the Sheriff Court at Ayr on 15th October 1901 to detention in said reformatory for two and a-half years. (6) That since the year 1885 the applicant has spent much of her time in prison under numerous sentences for theft and other offences, and during the four years preceding her son's death she was at liberty for only about ten months in all. (7) That during the said four years the applicant when out of prison lodged with relatives, to whom her son made payments for her maintenance, amounting on the average to 5s. or 6s. a week. (8) That during the said four years the applicant occasionally earned a little by outdoor work, but was otherwise entirely dependent upon her son. (9) That in August of the year in which he died the applicant's son, in conversation with a relative, indicated a wish to take up house with his mother when she came out of the reformatory."

The following question of law was stated:—"Was applicant dependent upon the earnings of her deceased son at the date of his death within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; and, if so, was she (a) wholly, or (b) partially dependent thereon?"

At the hearing it was stated that since the date when the case was stated by the Sheriff-substitute, Mrs Trainer had been sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

Argued for the appellants;—The claimant here was not dependent on her son at the date of his death. That was clear as a matter of fact, because she was being supported in the Inebriates' Home at the expense of the country. Dependence was a question of fact, involving three elements—inability of the dependant to support herself, a liability on the part of the deceased to support her, and actual support at the date of death.[1] None of these elements were present in this case. The Sheriff's finding was that the respondent was able to support herself, though she got money from her son when she could. Actual dependence was out of the case, and there was not even an obligation to support. The obligation of a son to support his mother was not unconditional, like the obligation of a husband to support his wife. It only emerged if the mother was unable to support herself, and if the son could support her without impoverishing himself. That distinguished the present case from the cases of Cunningham[2] and Sneddon,[3] where it had been held that a widow was entitled to compensation for the death of her husband, although at the date of the death she was not actually being supported by him. Besides, in these cases the husband was at the date of the death under an obligation which could have been enforced by an action for aliment; here, if the respondent had brought an action for aliment, the conclusive answer would have been that she being alimented the case of Rees v. Penrikyber Navigation Colliery Company[4] was exactly in point; there it was held that an inmate of a workhouse was not entitled to compensation for the death of his son, on the ground that, being supported in the workhouse, he was not dependent on the son.

Argued for the respondent;—There was here dependence within the meaning of the Act. It did not mean actual dependence on the day of the death. That would lead to the absurd result that if the dependant was on the actual day of the death temporarily in an hospital or undergoing a week's imprisonment, there could be no claim for compensation. The real meaning of "dependant" was a person who was entitled to rely, and did rely, on the deceased for support. The Sheriff had found in fact that the respondent was in that position; if his findings on that point were not clear, the case should be remitted to have it definitely stated. The decision in Turners Limited v. Whitefield[1] could not be reconciled with that in Sneddon v. Robert Addie & Sons' Collieries,[2] and the latter case, being the latest in date, should rule. The case of Rees[3] was distinguishable, because in English law a son was under no liability to support his parents, except under the poor law. Here a son, in the circumstances of the deceased, was bound to support his indigent mother, and therefore there was no distinction between her case and that of a wife.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the Sheriff, sitting as arbiter under the Workmen's Compensation Act, has found compensation due to the petitioner on the footing that she was wholly dependent on the deceased's son. Now, that is a case not like most of those which we have had in this Court, and not like any of the cases to which we were referred in the course of the argument, because these cases, I think all except the case of Rees,[3] were cases where it was a question as to a widow receiving compensation in respect of the death of her husband, she being dependent on him. Certainly there are some of these cases which are authorities for holding a woman to be dependent on her husband notwithstanding that the relief, the aid, he gave her during his lifetime was to some extent intermittent. I am not in the meantime prepared to go back on any of these cases as they have been decided. I do not think that practically they touch this case at all.

In the first place, this is a claim against a son; and the son is not liable for his mother's support at all if on the one hand she was able to support herself, or if on the other hand she was not able to support herself in whole or in part, but he was unable to support her from his earnings or without impoverishing himself. In regard to the first of these points there is nothing in this case to satisfy me that this woman was not quite able, if she behaved herself, to earn her own livelihood. She seems to have gone through a long course of crime, in fact to be almost a hopeless drunkard and a hopeless thief, the result being that her two last times of confinement have been two and a-half years in an inebriates' home, and that she is at the present moment undergoing three years' penal servitude for theft. Now, that is not a case in which it can be said, unless there was evidence of the fact to the satisfaction of the Sheriff, that she was not able to support herself, and the case as stated by the Sheriff certainly does not set out anything of the kind. It does indicate that during the short periods she was out of prison she did occasionally do work, and that is just what one expects of a person who was a thief as she was. At times she would be prowling about to see what she would steal, and at other times she was doing outdoor work. It is not said that she was doing work at times, and that on account of weakness of body and bad health she had to give it up. All that is said is "that during the said four years the applicant occasionally earned a little by outdoor work, but was otherwise entirely dependent upon her son." I take it that that means simply this, that when she was not working and came to her son he was willing to give her a little money, as any dutiful son, however poor in circumstances, would be. That case is not one in which the Sheriff could hold in law that she was entirely dependent on her son. Further, the Act requires that she should be, at the time of the death which gives rise to the claim if there is one, dependent on the earnings of the deceased. Now, it is quite plain that she was not free at that time—she was in confinement as a consequence of her own evil practices and not being supported by him, and nobody asking or suggesting that he should support her. She was being supported either by the local rates or by Government money. Therefore these two grounds seem to me sufficient to dispose of this claim adversely to the view expressed by the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with your Lordships on the merits. I think that the applicant for compensation was not dependent on her son at the time of his death in whole or in part in the sense of the statute, and that she has no claim.

At the same time I do not think that the decision now to be pronounced necessarily conflicts with the decision in the cases of Cunningham[1] and Sneddon[2] referred to by the respondent's counsel.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I should not have been prepared to hold that the Sheriff's judgment was wrong if this case could not be distinguished from the two recent cases in this Division—Cunningham v. Macgregor & Company[1] and Sneddon v. Addie & Company.[2] But this case is altogether exceptional, and I think a little attention to the facts demonstrates that. The respondents' son died on 2d December 1903. Now, at that time the respondent was undergoing the last of a long series of sentences. She was confined in an inebriates' home at Perth. She was committed on 15th October 1901, and her sentence (two and a-half years) did not expire until 15th April 1904; so that at the date of the death of her son in December 1903 there were still four months of her sentence to run. Thus at that date she was in no sense dependent on her son for support. She was being supported, as she had been supported intermittently since 1884, out of public funds. By the time she came out her son had been dead four months, and her claim for support against him therefore never emerged.

I do not proceed on the ground that there is a difference in the liability of a husband and a son; it is not necessary to consider that alleged distinction. I think that before a claim of this kind can be supported there must in the first place be total or partial incapacity on the part of the alleged dependant to support herself by working; in the second place, she must have no separate means; and in the third place, a legal claim for support must be shewn to have existed at the date of the death of the husband or son, whether that claim was being implemented or evaded. I think it will be found that in all the cases in which such a claim has been sustained these elements existed. In particular, they existed in the cases of Cunningham[1] and Sneddon.[2] In the statute the definition of dependants is "such of the persons entitled according to the law of Scotland to sue the employer for damages or solatium in respect of the death of the workman as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death." I agree that these words must receive a liberal construction, but I do not think we can hold, without stretching their meaning unduly, that at the date of the death of her son the respondent was in any proper sense dependent on his earnings for support.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the question of law therein stated by declaring that the applicant was not dependent upon the earnings of her deceased son at the time of his death in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897: Therefore recall the award of the arbitrator and remit to him to dismiss the claim."

Inland Revenue v. Old Monkland Conservative Association.

INLAND REVENUE, Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Dundas—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Income-tax—Exemption—Unincorporated Society—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 40, 163, 192.—An unincorporated society, whose aggregate annual income is less than £160, is entitled to claim exemption from income-tax under sec. 163 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, as extended by the Finance Act, 1894.

1ST DIVISION. Exchequer Cause.

THE OLD MONKLAND CONSERVATIVE ASSOCIATION appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income-Tax Acts for the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire against an assessment of £65 for the year 1903-1904, under Schedule A of the Income-Tax Acts, made upon it in respect of premises situated at No. 20-22 Church Street, Coatbridge, of which it was proprietor.

The following were the facts as found or admitted:—

"1. The Association is constituted under certain rules. A copy of the rules and bye-laws is appended hereto, and forms part of this case.

"2. The Association is the owner and occupier of the premises at No. 20-2 Church Street aforesaid. The premises are occupied by the Association as reading and recreation rooms, offices, &c.

"3. The feu-duty (£2, 15s. 5d.) paid by the Association for its premises, and the interest (£31) paid by it on a bond over its premises, amount to £33, 15s. 5d., from which the Association deducted income-tax amounting to £1, 10s. 11d.

"4. For the year of assessment the Association had no excess of income over expenditure."

The Association claimed total exemption from income-tax (except in respect of the feu-duty and interest referred to in No. 3 supra) for the year 1903-4, on the ground that its income from all sources did not exceed £160.*

The Commissioners sustained the appeal.

The Surveyor of Taxes required the Commissioners to state a case, which they did, setting forth the facts given above.

Argued for the appellants;—Unincorporated societies, such as the Association here in question, were expressly charged with income-tax under section 40 of the Act of 1842,* but they are not referred to in the exemption clause—section 163.* The words there used, "any person," did not include an Association such as this. The interpretation clause—section 192—did not extend "person" so as to include unincorporated societies.

Argued for the respondents;—The construction of the statute suggested by the Crown was unreasonable. Section 192 of the Act of 1842* defined "person" as meaning "several persons," and the Association was just a group of persons. In any case, it was the treasurer of the society to whom the Inland Revenue looked for payment, and he, as representing the society, was a person entitled to exemption.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether the Old Monkland Conservative Association is liable in an assessment of £65 for the year 1903-1904, under Schedule A of the Income-Tax Act, made upon it in respect of premises situated in Church Street, Coatbridge.—(His Lordship narrated the facts.)

It was maintained on behalf of the Crown that section 40 of the Act of

* The Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), enacts:—Sec. 40. "All bodies politic, corporate, or collegiate, companies, fraternities, fellowships, or societies of persons, whether corporate or not corporate, shall be chargeable with such and the like duties as any person will, under and by virtue of this Act, be chargeable with; and the chamberlain or other officer acting as treasurer, auditor, or receiver for the time being of every such corporation, company, fraternity, fellowship, or society shall be answerable for doing all such acts, matters, and things as shall require to be done by virtue of this Act, in order to the assessing such bodies corporate, companies, fraternities, fellowships, or societies to the duties granted by this Act, and paying the same."

Sec. 163. "Provided always that any person charged or chargeable to the duties granted by this Act, either by assessment or by way of deduction from any rent, annuity, interest, or other annual payment to which he may be entitled, who shall prove before the Commissioners for general purposes, in the manner hereinafter mentioned, that the aggregate annual amount of his income, estimated according to the rules and regulations of this Act, is less than £150, shall be exempted from the said duties . . ." [The Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 34, extends the exemption "to persons whose respective incomes do not exceed £160 a year."]

Sec. 192. "Wherever in this Act, with reference to any person, matter, or thing, any word or words is or are used importing the singular number or the masculine gender only, yet such word or words shall be understood to include several persons as well as one person, females as well as males, bodies politic or corporate as well as individuals, and several matters or things as well as one matter or thing, unless it be otherwise specially provided, or there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction . . ."

5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, was the charging section, and that although section 163 provided for exemption of "any person" having a specified limited aggregate annual income, the words "any person" could not be held to include the appellant's Association, as the wording of section 163 was repugnant to such a construction, and that the Association was not "a body politic or corporate."

It is, however, to be observed with reference to this contention, that by section 40 of the Act not only corporations and other proper legal persons are rendered liable, but also "fraternities, fellowships, or societies of persons, whether corporate or not corporate," and it is under these words that the appellant's Association becomes chargeable, although it is not a corporate entity in law. Prima facie one would expect if it is charged under any of the denominations above mentioned, it would, when its income does not exceed £160 a year, be exempted like an individual or a proper legal person, under the same or a similar denomination, and I think this is the true construction of the statute, the exemption, like the charge, including a group of individuals, such as the members of the Old Monkland Conservative Association, although they do not constitute either a corporation or any other legal entity.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the Commissioners acted rightly in sustaining the appeal, and that their decision should be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—The assessment in this case is imposed upon the respondents, the Old Monkland Conservative Association, under section 40 of the Income-Tax Act of 1842. The words of the Act are,—"All bodies politic, corporate, or collegiate, companies, fraternities, fellowships, or societies, whether corporate or not corporate, shall be chargeable with such and the like duties as any person will under and by virtue of this Act be chargeable with." I should have thought with your Lordship that the intention of that enactment was that corporations and persons not incorporated, or the persons therein enumerated, should be put in exactly the like position as single persons, that they were to be assessed in the same way and were to pay the same amount of assessment on their incomes, just like any individual. That I should have thought was the intention of the Act, and I suppose that the assessment is laid upon this Old Monkland Association as being a society of persons not incorporated, that is to say, imposed upon them as a non-incorporated society; but it appears to me, when the whole of the section is read, that there are very important considerations, which are these:—"The chamberlain or other officer acting as treasurer, auditor, or receiver for the time being of every such corporation, company, fraternity, fellowship, or society shall be answerable"—and this is the duty imposed by the Act—"for doing all such acts, matters, and things as shall be required to be done by virtue of this Act in order to the assessing such bodies corporate, companies, fraternities, fellowships, or societies to the duties granted by this Act, and paying the same." That is to say, that in the assessment of these bodies, whether corporate or unincorporate, the Inland Revenue authorities are to look to the officer of the society on whom the whole duty lies of representing the various societies, corporate and unincorporate, with reference to these assessing matters; and accordingly, it humbly appears to me, looking to the rules of this society, that the officer who in the case of this Association is charged by the Act with these duties is the treasurer. He, under the rules, is the person who is the receiver of all the money and accounts, and no doubt the treasurer of the society is the officer upon whom rests the duty of representing the society under the rules. Accordingly, when we come to consider the 163d section on which the case for the Crown rests, which is in these words,—"Any person charged or chargeable to the duties granted by this Act, either by assessment or by way of deduction from any rent, annuity," and so on, or other annual payment, will be entitled to prove the grounds of exemption, they say that that is a clause which is meant to exempt only an individual, and does not apply to societies, corporations, companies, and such like. I do not think that is the proper reading of it at all. The treasurer, or the person representing the society, is the person referred to in that clause of the Act; and accordingly, as I suppose this Old Monkland Association could not appear as a body, when a person representing them appears on their behalf, I think he was clearly the person representing the society referred to in that 163d section of the Act. It clearly appears that he, as the person representing the society, was entitled to obtain the exemption, if he proved his right to it. All through the Act, where there are references to these associations and companies and corporations, it is always a person that is spoken of and a person who represents and is bound to represent and act for the company. Now, this is a matter in regard to which the Act says that this person as representing the society should be exempted. Again, the interpretation section of the Act says that the word "person" referred to in the Act shall be understood to include several persons. Well, what is this Association? Is it not just an Association of several persons? I think that the true reading of the Act is that the person mentioned in the section includes the person entitled to appear as representing the Association, and claim exemption. On these grounds I think your Lordship's conclusion is right.

Lord M'Laren.—It has been the policy of the Revenue authorities, in applying to Parliament for money, to cast a wide net, and with meshes so small that no person within the general range of the Act can hope to escape upon the ground that he is not specifically included. In the year 1842, when the Income-Tax Act was passed, we had not the benefit of a General Interpretation Act for Acts of Parliament, and, accordingly, to avoid all such questions as have been argued in this case, it was customary to put every proposition both in the singular and the plural, with the addition of a reference to bodies corporate and others who might not be supposed to fall within the scope of a statute putting a tax upon persons or individuals. That practice led to a great deal of redundant phraseology but it had the merit of making the intention perfectly clear to anyone who read the Act. Now, in this Act, as in other taxing statutes, we find that the income-tax is laid not only upon individuals but on bodies politic and corporate and on unincorporated societies or fellowships. I agree with Lord Adam in holding that these last-mentioned words were unnecessary, because an unincorporated society is merely an aggregate of individuals who, if the question be of taxation on heritable property, may be regarded as tenants in common, or, if it is taxation of income, may be regarded as traders in common, and, therefore, affected by the general words "person or persons." It so happens that while in the clause laying on the tax the unincorporated societies are referred to in express terms, yet in the clause relating to the exemption of small incomes, unincorporated societies are not specially referred to. It may be that the framers of the Act had not thought that there would be any cases in point needing to be provided for, but of course if it is not necessary to mention unincorporated societies at all, the meaning of the two clauses will be the same; I mean, that the persons to whom they apply must be the same. I should be extremely reluctant to admit the supposition that some of the clauses of the Income-Tax Acts were intended to apply to a range of persons which included unincorporated societies, and that others which it is necessary to construe along with them were not to be applied to unincorporated societies. Nothing but the very clearest language of exclusion would, I think, lead to such an unnatural scheme of construction of an Act of Parliament. I therefore agree with your Lordships that both clauses are to be read as perfectly general in their terms and application, and, therefore, that this club which it is admitted has no income, is entitled to exemption.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

Tyler v. Logan.

HENRY PETERS TYLER, Pursuer (Respondent).—Constable—J. D. Smith.
GEORGE LOGAN, Defender (Appellant).—Crabb Watt, K.C.—A. M. Anderson.

Agent and Principal — Liability of agent to account — Unexplained deficiency.—The manager of a branch shop was supplied by his employer with goods marked and invoiced at selling prices. Receipts for the goods so received were signed by the manager. At a stock-taking there was a deficiency to the amount of £62.

In an action by the employer against the manager for this amount a proof was taken, in which there was no evidence of dishonesty or negligence on the part of the manager, but no explanation of the cause of the deficiency. Held (diss. Lord Young) that the employer was entitled to decree for £62, the retail price of the goods not accounted for.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfar.

HENRY PETERS TYLER, shoe and leather factor, Leicester, who owned a number of branch establishments for the sale of boots, in 1899 appointed George Logan as manager of one of his branches in Dundee, at a salary of 25s. per week. Logan had two assistants, whom he appointed.

The system on which the business was carried on was that boots marked with the selling prices were sent from Tyler's stores to Dundee as required, and that invoices of the goods with selling prices and receive notes were sent with each consignment, and were signed by the local manager on receipt. An agent on behalf of Tyler visited each branch shop at periodical intervals, and took an account of the stock. On each stock-taking the branch manager signed an acknowledgment of the stock as then existing.

Tyler v. Logan.

On the stock in Logan's shop being examined on 28th February 1903 it appeared that there was a deficiency to the amount of £62, 1s. 9d. At the previous stock-taking on 25th October 1902 the balance had proved correct, and the balance-sheet, acknowledging a certain amount of goods in stock, had been signed by Logan. In the interval goods had been supplied, and the invoices and receive notes for them had been regularly signed by Logan. In these circumstances the present action, in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire, was brought by Tyler against Logan, concluding for an accounting of the defender's intromissions since 25th October 1902, and for payment of the said sum of £62, 1s. 9d.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender, as manager of the pursuer's branch business as condescended on, is bound to account for his intromissions with the stock under his charge, and to make payment of any shortage unaccounted for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender having exercised all diligence in pursuer's service and having served him faithfully and honestly is not liable to the pursuer in any alleged shortage of stock unless he be personally in fault, which he was not, and no personal fault being alleged the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

Proof was allowed and led. At the proof the foregoing facts were established, and the invoices and receive notes for goods sent to Logan between 25th October 1902 and 28th February 1903 were produced. They were all duly signed by Logan. There was no evidence to explain the deficiency in the stock.

Horatio T. Cave deponed,—"I am superintendent of branches for pursuer, and have been so for twenty years. The pursuer has branch shops in different parts of the country, including four in Dundee, and I have the appointment of the managers and all the arrangements in connection with them. . . . (Q.) What were the terms of defender's appointment? (A.) That he should have sole control of the shop in the managing and ordering of the goods, and have charge of the ordinary working of the shop generally. He had the appointment of assistants and the power of dismissing them. He had unqualified charge of the shop, and we leave it to the managers to choose their own assistants so that they may be satisfied with them. . . . (Q.) Do you think it is possible that during these weeks from 9th December 1902 up to 28th February 1903 that £62 either in stock or cash could disappear without the knowledge of the manager? (A.) I don't think it is possible; I don't see how it could. Even spread over weeks the manager was bound to have seen it. I have calculated out the amount of pairs of boots that sum would represent and taking them at six pairs a £ that makes 360 pairs. (Q.) Is it possible for 360 pairs to have disappeared without it being known? (A.) No. The managers have sole control of the cash, and they bank the cash and advise the remittances to me. When I appointed Logan manager in the Princes Street shop I explained his position to him fully, what his duties were and his responsibilities. All managers are responsible for the stock. Cross-examined.—(Q.) Did you state to Mr Logan that he was responsible personally for all the stock in the shop, did you say such a thing to him? (A.) I must have done it, as I never appoint a manager without doing so, and I would never think of doing it."

The defender deponed,—"When I entered the amount of stock in these weekly statements I sent in, I did not check the stock in any way. The figures in these statements were simply put in to bring the total on the one side the same as the total on the other. (Q.) In fact it is a mere balance? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Were you ever told by Mr Cave or anyone that you were to be personally responsible for any shortage? (A.) No, I was never told anything of the kind. When I was in Glasgow I was only an assistant, and I only got an hour's notice to leave Glasgow and come to Dundee to take over the Princes Street shop. By the Court.—(Q.) There was no agreement about the footing on which you were to take it over? (A.) No. Neither Mr Cave nor anyone else ever said to me that I was to be responsible for any shortage. . . . Cross.—(Q.) Can you explain how the shortage could be there if you have acknowledged all these goods? (A.) I did not examine the invoices every week. (Q.) You have actually signed for the goods? (A.) We just let it go as being right. (Q.) Was it not your duty as manager to check the goods with the invoice? (A.) You could do it if you liked; I left it to the girls very often. (Q.) Was it not your duty to do it? [No answer.] (Q.) You signed for the goods? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Mr Tyler would only take your signature? (A.) Yes. By the Court.—(Q.) You signed without making personal examination to see whether they were correct or not? (A.) Yes, I trusted to the girls sometimes."

On 8th March 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender, when acting as manager for him in his shop, No. 15 West Port, Dundee, misappropriated his boots and shoes, or the money for which he sold them, by theft or embezzlement or in any manner of way: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the petition," &c.*

On appeal the Sheriff (Johnston) pronounced an interlocutor, by which he recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and made, inter alia, the following findings:—"Finds that from the nature of the defender's employment, the defender was accountable for the stock committed to him: Finds that he has failed to account for said stock to the value of £62, 1s. 9d., and accordingly that he is liable in that sum to the pursuer: Therefore ordains him to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £62, 1s. 9d." †

* "NOTE.— . . . Very little in this case is clear and free from doubt or ambiguity to me, but one conviction is clear, and that is that the defender seemed to me to be an honest man and a credible witness, and that, in so far as the prima facie case against him seems to be a true case, it depends upon his unconscious mistakes or errors, or upon blunders in working details by carriers and others in the large loosely managed wide-spread business of the pursuer. . . . My belief upon the matter of probability is that the bulk of the missing goods have never been delivered to the defender at his shop, but have been sent by mistake or accident to some other of the pursuer's shops, or are still in the pursuer's store at Leicester."

† "NOTE.—I so far agree with the Sheriff-substitute that I think it not improbable that the judgment I feel bound to pronounce in this case may bear hardly upon the defender, but I cannot on that ground abstain from pronouncing it. The defender is called upon to account for goods delivered to him, or for their proceeds. That the pursuer should succeed in his demand, I do not think that he is tied up to proving fraud or embezzlement, as in a criminal case. I should be sorry to attribute either to the defender without more definite proof, but I think that in the circumstances

Tyler v. Logan.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The pursuer was not entitled to succeed unless he proved fault on the part of the defender. There was no contract that the defender must account for all the goods he received, and he was not bound to establish the reason for the deficiency. He was entitled to absolvitor, unless it was definitely proved against him that the loss arose either from his dishonesty or negligence. Neither had been proved.

Counsel for the respondent supported the reasoning of the Sheriff.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the Sheriff here has arrived at the right conclusion. The appellant was employed as the manager of an establishment in which there were a large number of goods for sale, and it was part of his duties to take the management and care of these goods. The history of the case is, that when goods were sent to this establishment they were all duly labelled, with classes and prices mentioned, and invoices were presented and signed for all the goods that were sent. These invoices were signed by the appellant on the footing that the goods mentioned in the invoices and the goods received corresponded—it cannot be taken off his hands that they did not. If he did not see, when he passed the invoices, that the goods invoiced corresponded with the goods received, he was not fulfilling his duties as a manager. For a considerable time the stock showed a proper balance, there may have been some slight errors, but there he may be civilly liable for negligence just as completely as for embezzlement. . . .

"There remains the question of accountability at law. Now, the defender was not appointed under any written agreement, but I can have no doubt that Mr Cave, the pursuer's superintendent, was justified in saying that the defender was made thoroughly to understand that he was responsible for the goods delivered to him, or their value. Indeed, I cannot contemplate any other result from the circumstances and mode of conducting the business in which the defender had been brought up, and from the documents relating thereto, to which he was a party, even without any formal contract imposing as a term responsibility for the goods at the branch, upon him as manager. He was manager with control of the branch with authority to order in supplies, with the duty of banking to his employer's credit the weekly drawings, and with power to engage and dismiss his subordinates. I think that he was as much responsible to account for the goods committed to him or for their price as he would have been for cash remitted.

"The defence is that the shortage may be accounted for in half-a-dozen ways, though the defender is unable to prove any one of them. For instance, he suggests that the goods, though invoiced, may never have left Leicester, or at anyrate, may never have reached him. Conceivably this may be so, but, unfortunately, they are regularly invoiced, and he signs a receipt as though they were delivered. Moreover, he had an opportunity before signing the receipt, of which, on the evidence of the subordinates in the shop, he availed himself, of checking the invoices before signing for delivery, and where the proof fixing him with the goods is so complete, it is impossible to accept the mere suggestion that the shortage might be accounted for, if we had evidence, which we have not, as a defence to the pursuer's action.

"That there was leakage somewhere is evident from what I have said, and this is corroborated by proof of the marked falling off in the apparent takings in the last three or four months of the pursuer's management, coupled with the fact that immediately after the dismissal of the defender the business resumed its former dimensions."

was a reasonable balance in the circumstances. Then, on this particular occasion, when the appellant was about to be promoted to another establishment under the same employer, the general manager came to examine the stock, and his examination disclosed a shortage of more than £60. That shortage has never been accounted for. It is suggested that there may have been theft. That might account for the loss of a few pairs of boots, but as a general explanation of the deficiency it is quite out of the question. In these circumstances I think the Sheriff has come to the right conclusion —that the appellant, as manager, is responsible for the loss. In so deciding I express no opinion whatever against his honesty. I think there is no evidence of dishonesty, but that he is responsible I have no doubt.

LORD YOUNG.—As I understand your Lordship's opinion to be that of my other brethren on the bench, I shall confine my observations to what I think is due to the defender with respect to his character.

The defender was employed at a very small salary, from December 1899 till March 1903, as manager of a boot shop where hundreds of pairs of boots were sold nearly every week. Let me call attention to the pursuer's statement as to the defender's character as set forth in Condescendences 4 and 5. I think a more distinct statement in favour of the character of an employee could not be given by an employer. That statement refers to his work down to 25th October 1902, the date of the last stock-taking before the shortage now in question was discovered. It was at the next stock-taking, as at 28th February 1903, that the shortage was discovered, amounting to £62 1s. 9d.

Of course, if the defender had received money which he did not account for that would be a case of gross dishonesty. But that is not attributed to him by the pursuer, and is negatived by the evidence in the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute who took it, and that opinion is not dissented from by the Sheriff. The Sheriff thinks, however, that the defender "may be civilly liable for negligence just as completely as for embezzlement." I think the question is whether there was any negligence to lead to liability. That is not shewn. What is the negligence attributable to the defender? It is not that he should have discovered the shortage sooner, supposing it to have occurred between October and February. It occurred to me in the course of the argument that some of the goods consigned to the defender's care might have been stolen on their way to Dundee, and that he had nevertheless acknowledged that they had all arrived, his acknowledgment being, as described by the Sheriff-substitute, an acknowledgment that goods of the value specified in the invoice had arrived. If he had noticed sooner that they had not arrived, or if he had failed to notice it—suppose he had not examined the quantity of boots in the evening of each day, or that there had been misconduct on the part of the young women in the shop, how did the pursuer suffer by the defender having failed to protect him against the risk of loss in transit between Leicester and Dundee? I should have been disposed to hold that there was no ground of liability for negligence, any more than in the case of a domestic servant signing a receipt for goods delivered for his or her master.

I find no ground for interfering with the view of the Sheriff-substitute.

Tyler v. Logan.

I think the defender is an honest man, that no dishonesty is proved against him, but that his honesty is established by the evidence, and no such negligence is imputable to him as should induce us to pronounce decree for a sum which would be ruinous to a man in his position.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Sheriff.

Process—Proving the Tenor—Mortis Causa Disposition and Settlement—Casus Amissionis—Adminicle.—An action was brought in 1903 to prove the tenor of a mortis causa disposition and settlement, dated 13th November 1848. It was proved that the deceased, on 13th November 1848, the day of his death, had executed a settlement, which had been prepared by a law-agent, and was brought by him for signature, and that the deceased's estate had been administered in accordance with the terms of the deed libelled. No witness was adduced who had ever seen the original of the deed. The adminicle produced bore to be a copy of a mortis causa disposition and settlement signed by the deceased and his wife before witnesses on 13th November 1848, with testing-clause and signatures. The copy was in the handwriting of a clerk in the employment of the law-agent who had prepared the deed, and it was initialed on the back as compared. It was proved that upon the death of the law-agent in 1872 such of his papers as had not been claimed by clients were removed to the chambers of another law-agent, who had himself thereafter had more than one removal, and that upon search being made in 1903 the original deed could not be found.

The action was defended by the deceased's heir-at-law, who had acquiesced in the administration till 1903, when he discovered that no will could be found. He contended that the settlement must be held to have been destroyed by the granter animo revocandi. He did not question the bona fides of the administrators.

Held that the pursuers had proved that the testator had left a settlement in the terms libelled, and that a sufficient casus amissionis had been proved.

1ST DIVISION.

MRS JOAN ANDERSON OR YOUNG, Kilmarnock, and Mrs Margaret Anderson or Nutter, Glasgow, two of the four surviving children of the late Thomas Anderson, lath-splitter, Greenock, in 1903 brought an action of proving the tenor against their brother, Thomas Anderson, engineer, Glasgow, and their sister, Grace Anderson, 36 South Woodside Road, Glasgow. The action concluded for the proving of the tenor of a mortis causa disposition and settlement, executed by the parties' father on 13th November 1848, by which he disponed certain house property in Greenock to his "spouse in liferent during her widowhood, and to" his children nominatim equally in fee, as also in general his whole means and estate heritable and moveable. His wife was named executrix, but subject to the declaration (1) that she was to be bound to maintain and educate the children; (2) that if she entered into a second marriage all right and benefit enjoyed by her under the deed should cease and determine; and (3) that the provisions in her favour were to be in full satisfaction of her legal rights. The deed as libelled bore to be signed not only by the pursuers' father but also by their mother, Mrs Ann Gillies or Anderson, and by two witnesses.

The pursuers averred that since their father's death his estate, which consisted almost entirely of heritage, had been administered in terms of the will. That the rents had been paid to the widow for her own behoof by the factor who managed the property till her second marriage in 1850 to Mr James Middleton, and that thereafter she continued to draw the rents, and therewith supported and educated the children of her first marriage. That since the death of the testator's widow in 1865 the rents had been divided by the factor among the four children of the testator in terms of the will. That in 1867 a bond for £400 on the property was paid by the four children in equal shares, and a casualty partly by the son as heir-at-law and partly by the three daughters as singular successors.

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 9) "The pursuers have made every endeavour to find the principal of the said disposition and deed of settlement, but without success, and they have been unable to obtain any information as to when or in whose hands the deed went amissing. Mr Hugh Dempster, writer in Greenock, the agent who prepared the deed, died in the year 1869 or 1870, and the pursuers have ascertained that the papers in Mr Dempster's possession were taken over by Mr James Glen, writer, Greenock. The latter has made a diligent search for the deed, but has been unable to find it. The account incurred by the testator to the said Mr Dempster in connection with the preparation and execution of the said disposition and deed of settlement is produced herewith. Said account bears to have been settled on 10th May 1851."

Defences were lodged for Thomas Anderson, the testator's heir-at-law. He stated, inter alia, "that he understood in a general way, from what he was told by other members of the family, and from seeing the alleged copy produced, that his father had left a will, but he had no personal knowledge of the matter, and, owing mainly to the fact that he lived for the most part abroad, he never investigated the matter till quite recently. As the result of inquiries he has recently made, he believes and avers that his father did not leave at his death any settlement."

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) made great avizandum.

By interlocutor, dated 9th March 1904, the First Division allowed a proof, which was taken before Lord Adam.

The pursuers produced as an adminicle a copy of the deed libelled, with testing-clause and signatures. The testing-clause set forth that the deed was written by Alexander Chalmers, a clerk to Hugh Dempster, writer in Greenock, and was subscribed by the testator, Thomas Anderson, and by his wife in token of her acceptance of the provisions in her favour, before the said Hugh Dempster and the said Alexander Chalmers as witnesses. This copy did not have the name of Mr Dempster on the back. It was initialed as having been compared. It was in the handwriting of John Park, a clerk in Mr Dempster's employment. Mr Dempster's account for the preparation of the deed and attending at its execution was produced. The evidence on this point is fully stated in Lord Adam's opinion.

No witness was adduced who could speak to having ever seen the principal of the deed libelled. Dempster, the law-agent, and his clerks, Park and Chalmers, were all dead.

The following facts were proved:—After the testator's death the rents of the property (about £30 annually) were paid by the factors, Messrs Agnew, to the testator's widow for her own behoof till her marriage to Mr James Middleton in 1850, and thereafter they continued to be paid to her for the board and education of her children. After her death in 1865 her husband received and divided the rents among the children. In 1886 Mr Middleton was asked by Thomas Anderson and his sisters to become factor, and he managed the property and divided the rents till his death in 1898. Thereafter Messrs Paterson & Anderson became factors, and the rents were sent to Miss Grace Anderson, who divided them equally.

The defender was about six years of age when his father died. He was brought up by his mother and Mr Middleton. In 1864 he got an appointment as an engineer in the Indian Merchant Service. When he left Scotland he gave instructions that half his salary should be paid to his mother. When in India he was in the practice of making remittances to Mr Middleton for various purposes, among others for monthly payments to his unmarried sister, Miss Grace Anderson, to the amount of £70 per annum. In 1874 he came home for a visit, when he saw a copy of his father's settlement, but he made no inquiry about it. When he left for India in October 1874 he gave a letter to Mr Middleton empowering him to act for him "in all matters relating to the receiving of money and management of my property in Greenock or elsewhere." He deponed that during the whole time he was in India he was quite willing that the whole rents should go to his sisters and Mr Middleton and be used by them.

In April 1903 the defender's sisters wished to sell the property, and he rather unwillingly consented. It was then discovered that the principal settlement could not be found, and the sisters' agents applied to the defender to sign a petition for service as heir-at-law, but he declined to do so. The position he then took up is shewn in a letter, dated 9th July 1903, to the pursuers' law-agents, which bore,—"It is evident, however, that the object aimed at is with the view of my sisters being enabled by legal means to obtain that which I have hitherto granted to them without question, and because of my feelings of friendship to them, I shall not, of course, take any exception to the taking of counsel's opinion, &c., but while that is so, I have decided to let you know that I have up till the date of my letter of the 7th April, and in fact until quite recently, have always thought that which I was led to believe, that my father had made a will, and that the same had been properly executed. 2d. That the will was in existence. 3d. That it had been registered for preservation and reference, and owing to my having always been abroad it never occurred to me to investigate the matter. It now appears, however, that the supposed will cannot be found, neither has it been registered, and that all proceedings have apparently had reference only to an alleged copy of a will. The knowledge of these facts has caused me in a sense to cancel any previous instructions to you, also my letter of 7th April, so that I cannot allow the property to be sold."

The defender deponed,—"So far as I know, during the whole time I was in India Mr Middleton continued to manage the property, whatever there was to do with it. I took no personal interest in the matter; I left the whole thing to Mr Middleton. By Lord Adam.—I was brought up with Mr Middleton before I went to India. I had entire confidence in him. I had considerable regard for him, and so far as I know, he had an equal regard for me. (Q.) Do you think that Mr Middleton was a person who, if he were aware that you had a right to the whole rents of this property, would have deprived you of them knowingly? (A.) No, I don't think that he would do so knowingly."

Argued for the pursuers;—It was proved (1) that a mortis causa deed was executed by the deceased on 13th November 1848; (2) that he died on that day; (3) that from his death on till recently the deed in the terms libelled had been acted on continuously without any question; (4) that the deed had now disappeared and could not be found; and (5) that the tenor of the deed was as libelled. These facts were sufficient to entitle the pursuers to decree. If the principal had been destroyed before the deceased's death, that must have been known to the law-agent and the widow, and if they acted on it, they must have conspired to commit a fraud. The law-agent in issuing a copy of the deed must also have committed a fraud if the principal had been cancelled. As to the casus amissionis, a special casus required to be proved or not according to circumstances, and the whole circumstances must be looked to. The nature of the deed libelled was only one of the circumstances. The loss of the deed must be proved to have taken place in some way not inconsistent with the continued validity of the deed.[1] Here it was proved that the deed must have been lost or destroyed after the death of the testator when its destruction could not affect its validity. In such circumstances proof of a change from one office to another had been held sufficient.[2]

Argued for the defender;—There was no evidence that the copy of the deed produced was a copy of the original, or that it was issued by the law-agent as such. It did not sufficiently prove the tenor of the deed, and it did not prove that the original remained uncancelled at the testator's death. If a mortis causa deed, which could be revoked by destruction, could not be found, the presumption was that it had been cancelled by being destroyed by the testator, and this presumption could only be overcome by clear proof to the contrary.[3] Here there was no proof that the principal deed had continued in existence after the testator's death. There was evidence to shew that he was unwilling to sign the deed, and that he did not die on the day he signed it, but three days later. In view of these facts it was not only possible but even likely that he should have destroyed it before he died. There was no such averment or proof of a casus amissionis as was required in the case of a deed such as this, which could be cancelled or revoked by destruction. Nothing more was alleged or proved than that it had disappeared—how, when, or where, did not appear. That was not enough.[4]

Young v. Anderson.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action of proving of the tenor of a trust-disposition and settlement, said to have been executed by the late Mr Thomas Anderson, by which he is alleged to have disposed of his whole estate, consisting of certain houses in Greenock—for there was little or no personal property—in favour of his wife in liferent, so long as she remained his widow, and of his children in fee. Four of his children still survive. Two of them appear as pursuers in this action, and two of them are called as defenders. By this alleged settlement the truster nominated his wife as his executrix, but during her widowhood only. After directing payment of debts he provides that the widow shall be bound to maintain and educate his children, and he declares that in the event of her second marriage all right and benefit enjoyed by her under the settlement shall cease and determine. These are the main provisions of this will. It is said to have been signed by the testator himself and by his wife—by her, no doubt, in token of her acceptance of its provisions in full of her legal claims. Ex facie as it is set forth in the summons it is quite regular and formal in every respect if it ever existed. That document has gone amissing, and two of the daughters have brought this action to have it set up, and their reason for doing so is very plain, because by the settlement they are each entitled to a fourth of the property, but if their father left no settlement the defender, his son Thomas, gets the whole of it.

In the evidence the defender Thomas Anderson says, and quite rightly, that his case is not that his father did not make a will, but that he did not leave a will. That is a very proper statement of the case, for I think there can be no reasonable doubt that a settlement in the terms set forth was executed by the deceased. We know that a copy of it was made in the office of Mr Dempster, who was the testator's law-agent, by one of his clerks, and this copy bears on its back that it was compared. It must have been compared with some original. It is impossible to believe that this copy was simply concocted. Then it appears from the evidence of the testator's daughter, who was present when he was on his deathbed, that Mr Haddow, a friend of the testator's, and the law-agent, Mr Dempster, came to her father on the night of the 13th November 1848, which is the date of the will. Then there is the law-agent's account for the preparation of the will, in which it is stated that on 9th November Mr Dempster was instructed to draw out the deed of settlement, and that he called upon Mr Anderson with the draft that night, but there was some difficulty about its terms in consequence of which he refused to sanction it. It is explained that this difficulty was that he thought his wife would marry again, and in that case he did not want her to have the liferent. But the difficulty was got over by the insertion of the clause declaring that on her second marriage her liferent should cease, and accordingly we find the next entry in the account is "Nov. 13, Calling upon you with Mr Haddow in the forenoon, when you consented to execute the trust-disposition," and then under the same date, "Attendance with you in the afternoon getting it executed." I have no doubt that this document, which is produced, is a copy of the settlement which was so executed. So far, I think we may hold the case is proved.

But then comes the question, whether the deed so executed was still in existence at the date of the testator's death, and that is the question which the defender raises in this case. Did Anderson destroy the settlement before his death? The defender says there is no proof that the settlement was in existence after his father's death, and that therefore there is a presumption that it was destroyed by the testator for the purpose of cancelling it.

I think the proof is to the effect that the testator died on the same night that the will was executed. The defender says he did not die till the 16th November. His object in prolonging the interval between the date of executing the will and the date of the death is to make the time for cancelling by destroying the will longer. I think the evidence shews that the testator died on the 13th. There is another account produced—a doctor's account—which ceases on the 13th. The reasonable presumption is that the doctor's attendance continued till Anderson's death. Then there is the evidence of the testator's daughter, Mrs Young, which is to the effect that she thinks he died on the 13th, though she is not perfectly certain at this distance of time. The only counter evidence is the tombstone. Tombstones are proverbially no great authorities. This tombstone was erected many years after 1848, and I can place no great reliance upon it compared with the other evidence.

Passing from the evidence as to the date of the death, what is the evidence of the existence of the will after the testator's death? There is some slight direct evidence. Mr Middleton asked Mr Agnew (the factor on the heritable property left by the testator) to go to the superior's agent and settle about a casualty which was claimed, and he went and did so, and after that he wrote to Mr Middleton saying that he returns "the disposition and deed of settlement." He does not call it a copy. I do not put much weight on that, but it is an indication that the principal of the deed was at that date (1878) still in existence.

But then we come to the real and conclusive facts in this case. There were three persons in existence after Anderson's death, who must have known whether the will still existed after his death—Mr Dempster, the law-agent, the widow, Mrs Anderson, afterwards Mrs Middleton, and Mr Middleton. They must have known whether or not Anderson left a will. What they did after his death was in accordance with the will and nothing else. Until her second marriage the widow was entitled to draw, and did draw, the rents of the houses. On her second marriage, what ought properly to have been done under the will was to divide the rents equally among the children. But the children were young, and, as was only natural, the mother received the rents and maintained the children out of them. This was not strictly in accordance with the will, but it was very natural. But still the transmission of the right from the mother to the children was marked in the accounts, for after the mother married again the heading of the house factor's statement was different. Before 1850 the rental statements are made to Mrs Anderson, as she was the person to whom the rents were to go. But after her second marriage the heading became—"Rental statement, Mr Thomas Anderson's heirs in account with Alexander Agnew," shewing that although the money was sent to the mother, it was sent to her, whether rightly or wrongly, for behoof of the heirs, her children, who were entitled to it equally under the will, to be expended by her upon their maintenance.

No. 23.

Young v. Anderson.

Mrs Middleton died in 1865. After that the rents were regularly divided into four parts, and one-fourth part was treated as payable to each of the children. That was just in accordance with the will. But that was not all. There was a bond on the property for £400; and who paid it? Not the defender, who was the heir-at-law. It was paid by the children in equal proportions. Now, it is said that three of them had no right to the property, and yet we find that in 1867 they each paid a fourth of the bond over it. Then there was another thing. A casualty fell due. How was it paid? Just in the same way as the bond, by the children and not by the heir alone. Three of them as not being heirs paid composition each for one-fourth of the property, and the defender paid a much smaller sum for his fourth as relief-duty because he was the heir. Was all this a fraud? Are we to say that Mrs Middleton (formerly Mrs Anderson), the mother, Mr Dempster, the law-agent, and Mr Middleton entered into a fraudulent conspiracy to defeat the rights of the defender, the heir, then a little boy six years old? If not how can we account for what was done except upon the supposition that they knew there was a settlement in these terms, and acted upon it. I do not say that the defender is barred by what he did from claiming his rights now. But I say it is impossible to account for what was done except by the existence of the will. The defender very honestly says that he does not believe Mr Middleton, for whom he had a great regard, would have been guilty of such a fraud. I do not believe it either, and therefore I think what was done by him and the other two must have been done in accordance with a will which they knew had been left by the father of these children.

But then it is said that the casus amissionis is not sufficiently proved. I think it is. Mr Dempster died in 1872. His clerks were left in his office for a time, and such of his clients as wished to do so came and removed their papers just as they liked. After a time what was left was removed to Mr Glen's office. There was a considerable risk of papers going amissing under such circumstances. In such a case as the present, if it is clear that a will in the terms libelled was in existence after the testator's death—as I hold it is—no great proof of the casus amissionis is required. The question simply comes to be—Whether in the whole circumstances the Court is satisfied that a deed in the terms set forth was in existence after the testator's death, and that it cannot now be found although every search has been made. I think the proof upon both these points is sufficient.

Lord M'Laren.—I quite agree with all Lord Adam has said, and my remarks shall be brief. Mr Macmillan, in his opening speech, sought to establish, first, that the will was executed by Thomas Anderson in 1848, that it was found unaltered at his death, and that it was acted upon; second, that the will went amissing, and that the casus amissionis is proved; and, third, that the tenor is proved by the copy produced. If these facts are proved, the pursuers have established their case. Now, I confess I do not

Nov. 23, 1904.
Young v. Anderson.

entertain any doubt that a will in the terms quoted was executed. It is true the testator is dead, and the solicitor who prepared the will died many years ago. I here note that it is a guarantee of good faith in this case that the agency of a solicitor was sought. He is dead; the clerk who was the other instrumentary witness is dead; Mrs Anderson is gone; and no one apparently is now living who had seen that deed. Consequently it has to be set up by secondary evidence. Now, the secondary evidence, which is really as good as could be expected after such a lapse of time, is, first, the agent's account, which sets out the whole facts connected with the preparation and execution of the settlement; next, one of the daughters, Mrs Joan Young, who was then twelve years of age, distinctly remembers that Mr Dempster, the solicitor, and the friends who were advising, were going about the house immediately before her father's death, and she said she knew it was about a will; that Mr Dempster, the solicitor, was preparing a will, and she had no doubt at all that the will was executed. Then it is important to notice that Mrs Anderson, the mother of these children, who drew the rents for herself and her family, acting upon the authority of this will, could not possibly have been mistaken about the will, because she signed it to shew that she accepted its provisions. Mr Dempster, who had the custody of the document, and from whose office a copy was sent for the family, could not be mistaken about it, because he was himself one of the instrumentary witnesses, and he must have known as a professional man that if a will was found in a mutilated state he could not act upon it. If it is established that the settlement was executed, then I agree with what Lord Adam said, that with the evidence we have before us then, if the will was cancelled before Anderson's death, we must assume that all the parties who have been named were in a conspiracy to commit a fraud against the interests of Thomas Anderson, who was then a boy of six years of age. I do not believe it. I should not be inclined to assume fraud against anyone, and I think everything must be presumed to have been honestly done in the absence of evidence to the contrary. I do not agree with the argument that was addressed to us—that it must be presumed that the will was revoked, unless it is proved that it was not revoked. That is a very extraordinary negative for anyone to be called on to prove, and I should doubt if it were possible to establish such a negative by proof. But the law does not impose such an onus on anyone. I think that to assume that the will is revoked unless you can shew that it was not revoked, would be a dangerous doctrine if anybody could be got to believe in it. I do not think that is likely to be the case. The will being thus proved to be regularly executed, I agree with Lord Adam that the circumstances are sufficient to account for its disappearance, and especially this—that not only were there several changes of domicile on the part of the agent who succeeded Mr Dempster, but that Mr Dempster himself seems to have been a little careless in the way he kept his papers. Perhaps he had not a very large business, and if he kept papers relating to properties not of very great value loose, such papers would be liable to be mislaid. I think the case is quite as strong as many in which we have held that changes of residence on the part of the agents who had charge of a paper might account for its disappearance. As to the tenor of the deed there can be no doubt, if you assume there was a valid will, because the copy in process has been identified as being in the handwriting of one of Mr Dempster's clerks—not the writer of the deed, but a different clerk—and that is spoken to by Mr Glen, who knew his handwriting. Well, then, unless we were to suppose that they also were parties to the hypothetical fraud, the copyist must have had either the original will or the draft from which it was extended before him when he made the copy. It is important to observe that this copy (whether made from the draft or not) is not a copy of an uncompleted deed—it contains a testing-clause, and bears to have been signed by the testator.

No. 23.

Young v. Anderson.

I therefore hold that all the points necessary to be made out in an action of this kind are satisfactorily proved. Indeed I cannot help being surprised that long after the death of all the parties to the preparation and execution of this will, so much evidence should have been found as has been adduced to set up this document.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the case proved for the reasons already given, and I have nothing to add.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the cause, with the adminicles produced and proof adduced, and heard counsel for the parties, find the casus amissionis of the disposition and deed of settlement libelled proven, and the tenor thereof as libelled proven, and decern and declare accordingly in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

THE weekly publications known as Answers and Tit-Bits, published weekly, offer to pay certain sums to the next of kin of any person killed in a railway accident, provided that he has a copy of the current issue of the paper in his possession at the time. The following is an excerpt from the advertisement, as contained in Answers of 25th July 1903:—"£1000 FREE INSURANCE.—In the event of any person, having the current number of Answers on him or her at the time,

"The person or persons who shall be adjudged by the editor of Answers to be the next of kin of the deceased shall be the only person or persons entitled to receive and give a valid discharge for the money."

The advertisement in Tit-Bits was in the following terms:—"Tit-Bits SYSTEM OF LIFE INSURANCE.—One Hundred Pounds will be paid by the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited, 36 to 44 Moorgate Street, London, E.C., to the person whom the Editor of Tit-Bits decides to be the nearest relation of anyone who is killed in a Railway Accident in the United Kingdom, provided a copy of the current issue of Tit-Bits is found upon the deceased at the time of the catastrophe, or if it is proved that he or she is a subscriber through a Newsagent or through the Publishers.

"It must be distinctly understood by all subscribers to this paper that the decision as to the payment of the Insurance Money is left entirely to the opinion of the Editor, and his decision is final. All copies of this paper are purchased subject to that condition."

On 27th July 1903 William Simpson Hunter, painter, Glasgow, was killed in a railway accident at St Enoch Station, Glasgow. At the time of the accident he had in his possession copies of the current numbers of Answers and Tit-Bits. He was survived by three brothers and a sister.

Claims were made to the editors of Answers and Tit-Bits by the sister, Miss Hunter, and by David Hunter, one of the deceased's brothers.

The editors of both papers, after inquiry, adjudged Miss Hunter to be the next of kin of the deceased, and paid to her the sum of £1000 and £100.

An article in Answers for 19th September 1903, after narrating the accident and the claims made, gave the following account of the decision of the editor, and his reasons for it:—

"It was evident that this was a case in which the editorial discretion would have to be used in deciding as to whom the money was to go.

"We further instructed our Glasgow agents to inquire into this second claim.

"The legal formalities, such as the preparation of affidavits of witnesses, &c., took some time; but in the end it was found that, as had been stated by Miss Hunter's solicitors, she had been to a large extent dependent on the earnings of the deceased man for her support, and that, to put the matter briefly, she had been the principal sufferer by her brother's death.

"Upon this we had no hesitation in adjudging Miss Hunter the next of kin of the deceased man, and we lost no time in intimating that decision to our agents and Miss Hunter's solicitors."

An article to the same effect appeared in Tit-Bits of 19th September 1903.

In these circumstances, the present action was brought against Miss Hunter by David Hunter, and Alexander Hunter, both labourers in Glasgow, two of the brothers of the deceased W. S. Hunter, concluding for payment to each of them of the sum of £275. They averred that the sums of £1000 and £100, paid by Answers and Tit-Bits, formed part of the estate of the said deceased W. S. Hunter, and that, as he died intestate and unmarried, they were, together with their remaining brother and the defender, each entitled to one-fourth of the said sums.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(4) In respect that the said sums of £1000 and £100 were paid to the defender under contracts of insurance entered into by the deceased William Simpson Hunter upon his life as condescended on, the said sums belong to the estate of the deceased, and the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved. (7) On a sound construction of said contracts of insurance, the pursuers' interest in the sums insured is not affected by the selection by the editor of a person to whom payment may be made, and from whom a discharge may be received by the insurer.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—The defender having been adjudged by the editors of Answers and Tit-Bits, whose discretion is absolute, as entitled to payment of the amounts insured, is not bound to divide the said amounts according to the rules of intestate succession.

On 2d July 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor whereby he assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action.*

* "OPINION.—In this case the contentions of both parties have been particularly well stated. Indeed I have seldom seen a case so well stated both on record and in argument. The question is rather a novel one, and I have endeavoured to consider it on its merits, as well as with reference to the decision in the case of Law v. Newnes, 21 R. 1027, which, prima facie, at least seems to rule it.

"My view is this, and I think it is fairly clear, that the question depends upon this—whether the two funds in question were in bonis of the deceased at his death. If they were, I do not doubt that, although paid over to the defender (who was only one of the next of kin), she (the defender) would have been liable to account as for money received on behalf of the estate. I do not say she would have been liable to account to the pursuers, but to anyone whether belonging to the family or not, who had obtained the office of executor of the deceased. On the other hand, if the money was not in bonis of the deceased, I do not see how there can be any liability to account to anybody. There could, ex hypothesi, be no liability to account to the executor of the deceased as such; and as regards the pursuers, the defender has no contract with them, nor did she receive the money under any contract to pay to them.

"Now, this being so, what is the test as to whether these moneys were in bonis of the deceased? The test I think is, and must be this—Could the pursuers, supposing they had been decerned and confirmed executors of the deceased, have sued—I mean successfully sued—the debtors under the coupons—the two newspaper proprietors—for payment? And as to that, I do not see how there can be any doubt, at all events if the case of Law v. Newnes was, as I must hold it was, well decided. For the judgment in that case—a substantially similar case—was, that it was a condition precedent of the debtor's obligation—a condition precedent of the right to sue under it—that the person suing for payment should be clothed with a right to sue conferred by the editor of the paper—the editor of the paper in each case being empowered to select the recipient of the bounty. The obligation is to pay to such person as shall have been adjudged by the editor of the paper to be the next of kin in the one case, and the nearest relation in the other. And, of course, if that is so, it is quite inconsistent with the moneys being in bonis of the deceased. The obligation at its best is an obligation

Hunter v. Hunter.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The money paid by the newspapers was in bonis of the deceased. No doubt under the terms of the advertisement the newspapers would be discharged by payment to the person they selected as the next of kin, at least if they made their selection honestly. But they made the person selected a trustee for the next of kin. The advertisement was a policy of insurance granted to the deceased by the editors of the papers, as part of the consideration he received by paying the price of the paper. It was in the same position legally as a policy of insurance, bond, or deposit-receipt taken by A and bearing to be payable to B. If not delivered to B, such a policy, bond, or receipt was part of A's estate on his death.[1] The case of Law v. Newnes[2] only affirmed the liability of the newspaper, it did not decide the ultimate right to the money. The fact that the deceased left it to the editor of the newspaper to decide to whom the money was to be paid did not amount to a legacy by him to that person.[3]

The respondents supported the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the facts which are admitted in this case shew that the money was neither paid to nor accepted by the defender on the footing that she was receiving it only for the purpose of giving a discharge to the insurers and as trustee for other persons. In the case of Law v. Newnes[2] it was decided that the editor of the paper was entitled to nominate whom he pleased as the next of kin, provided he acted in bona fide. In this case the documents shew that he did so act, and that the defender was adjudged to be the next of kin after careful inquiry. I think no one can have any claim against her on the ground that she is only a trustee for the money received, and any claim there might be by the remaining next of kin against the paper for paying away the money wrongfully could not be a claim against her.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that in the circumstances of this case a very important legal question might be raised as to whether the proprietors of these newspapers ever came under any legal obligation to anyone under the not in favour of the deceased, or in favour of the deceased's executors, but in favour of persons who are to be selected by the editors as possessing the requisite character, the grounds of selection, whether good or bad, being immaterial if, in point of fact, they are honest.

"The only doubt I have had is whether I ought not to have the facts ascertained by a proof—I mean the facts in connection with the editor's adjudication. But it did not appear to me that there was any real dispute between the parties that the editors proceeded as set out in the defences. What occurred is, I see, set out at length in one of the newspapers which was used at the discussion, and it appears that the two editors both arrived at the same result after hearing both parties—coming both—whether they were right or wrong, to the conclusion that the proper person to receive the benefit was the defender, the deceased's sister, who had lived with the deceased, and had the main interest in his life.

passages which are cited and upon which any claim must be founded. But no such question is raised here, nor is it likely to arise, because these offers are made for the purpose of promoting the sale of the paper, and if the payments were not made honestly each time a bona fide claim was lodged, they would fail to have the effect which they are intended to produce. It is admitted that at the moment when Mr Hunter was killed he was in possession of the current numbers of Tit-Bits and Answers, and that these papers paid the sums promised by them to the person selected by the editors as the next of kin of deceased. The question now arises whether the passages in the papers referred to import that the person who received the money did so on her own account or as trustee for the whole next of kin. I think it is not doubtful that according to the intention of the proprietors of the papers, the editors were to select the persons to whom the money was to be paid, and that such selection was made after full and proper inquiry, the choice falling on the person who was considered most in need of the money. The money was paid to that person, and the discharge granted by her was a full and sufficient discharge of the obligations on the part of the newspapers to pay the money—if any such obligation existed, regarding which I have, as I have said, considerable doubt. And I am clearly of opinion that she received the money on her own account, and not as trustee for the whole next of kin. This follows from the judgment in the case of Newnes,[1] where the Court upheld the selection made by the editor of the paper even though the person nominated was not strictly the next of kin of the deceased, and where I consider it to have been decided that the person chosen was entitled to the money for her own use. But even apart from the case of Newnes,[1] I am of opinion that the defender is absolutely entitled to the money which has been paid to her, and that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

Lord Trayner.—The main argument urged for the reclaimers is that this money which was paid to Miss Hunter was in bonis of the deceased brother, and therefore that as he died intestate it falls to be divided among his next of kin. Now, if anything in respect of the alleged contract of insurance was in bonis of the deceased it was only an obligation by the insurers. If so, then the next of kin may have an action against the insurers, but they can have no claim against the present defender, who was debtor in no obligation, nor can they claim from her anything that the insurers were pleased to give her. The claim on the part of the next of kin against the insurers (if it exists) would not justify a claim against the defender or a decree against her. The next point urged is, that although the defender got the money on terms that made it her own so far as the insurers were concerned, she got it on terms which made her a trustee for its distribution among the next of kin of the deceased. That depends upon the contract on which the money was paid, whether it was or was not received on terms which made the defender a trustee. Whether there was an enforceable contract between the deceased and the proprietors of the newspapers is a matter on which I express no opinion. It was not argued to us, but I assume for the moment that there was such a contract. But if so what was the contract? It is expressed in the advertisement from which alone it can be gathered, and is to the effect that the proprietors of Answers would pay £1000 to the person adjudged by the editor to be the next of kin of any person killed in a railway accident, and having the current number of the paper in his or her possession at the time. I need not refer to the advertisement in Tit-bits, because it is practically to the same effect. The advertisements go on to say—"The persons who shall be adjudged by the editor of Answers to be the next of kin of the deceased shall be the only person or persons entitled to receive and give a valid discharge for the money." It is suggested that that only means that it is left to the editor of the newspaper to select from among the next of kin one who may give him a good discharge, leaving the question as to whom the money belongs to be settled among the next of kin. I am unable to read the contract in any such way. The words I have quoted above do not mean that the person selected is to be the only person entitled to give a good discharge, but that the person adjudged by the editor to be the deceased's next of kin is to be the only person entitled to claim the money, to receive it, and to give a good discharge. Here the editor, having the whole circumstances before him, including the fact that there were other next of kin, adjudged that the defender was the person entitled to claim the money, to receive it, and to give a discharge. I repeat what I said in the case of Law v. Newnes,[1] that if the editor was proved to have acted in mala fides some remedy would be found. But in the present case there is no suggestion of mala fides; the editor seems to have acted on intelligible and reasonable grounds. He made full inquiry into the circumstances and found that Miss Hunter resided with her deceased brother, and, as he says, that she had been to a large extent dependent on the deceased man for her support, and was the principal sufferer by his death.

[1] 21 R. 1027.

Hunter v. Hunter.

I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment here is well founded, and also that it is in entire accordance with the decision in Law v. Newnes.[1]

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of the same opinion. If the editor of Answers had a power of selection, there is an end of the question; because the narrative of the case published in his paper shews that, in the full knowledge of the existence and claims of other next of kin, he selected Miss Hunter not as a trustee but as an individual; and that he favoured her claim because she was the principal sufferer by the death of the deceased. If, on the other hand, the editor acted ultra vires and not in good faith, then I doubt whether the pursuers have any claim against Miss Hunter. They may, but I greatly doubt it, have a right of action against Answers. But, if they have any legal claim, it can only be against that paper, because, after full inquiry, the sums in question were paid to Miss Hunter for her own use alone.

On the whole matter, in accordance with the decision of the case of Law v. Newnes,[1] my opinion is that the editor had an unqualified power of selection, provided he exercised it in bona fide; and it is not suggested that he acted otherwise.

MRS MARGARET SMITH LINDSAY SINCLAIR FORREST OR REID AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—Morton.

Succession—Fee or Liferent—Vesting—Repugnancy.—A trust-disposition and settlement contained the following clauses:—"(Sixth) I leave and bequeath the residue of my estate, means, and effects, heritable and moveable, for behoof of all my children equally, and direct my trustees to pay over to each of my sons, as soon as conveniently may be after my death, the share of said residue falling to him: . . . And my trustees shall hold the shares of my daughters during their respective lives, and on the death of each shall pay her share to such person or persons as she may appoint by any revocable deed executed by her after she has attained the age of twenty-one years, and failing such appointment, then to her own nearest heirs"; but with power to the trustees to encroach on the share of which a daughter "may be receiving the income" to an extent not exceeding £200 to provide her with an outfit on marriage. There followed a declaration that "the whole of the said provisions, whether of capital or income, so far as conceived in favour of or devolving upon females, shall be for their own sole and separate use, shall not be assignable by them or attachable for their debts or obligations, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband or husbands they may marry, and shall not be subject to the debts of such husbands or the diligence of their creditors."

Held that on a sound construction of the above provisions the daughters had not a right of fee, but merely a liferent with a power to test on the capital of their shares.

1ST DIVISION. CHARLES LAING FORREST, merchant, Leith, died on 20th July 1903 survived by a widow, and by four sons and two daughters of his first marriage, three daughters of his second marriage, and a son of his third marriage.

He left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. By the sixth purpose he provided as follows:—"(Sixth) I leave and bequeath the residue of my estate, means, and effects, heritable and moveable, for behoof of all my children equally, and direct my trustees to pay over to each of my sons, as soon as conveniently may be after my death, the share of said residue falling to him: Declaring that notwithstanding the direction herein contained full power is hereby given to my said trustees, if they shall think it necessary or expedient, to retain in their hands the whole or any part of the capital falling to any one or more of my said sons, and merely to pay the income thereof to the son or sons whose capital is so retained during their respective lives or so long as my trustees may think fit, and the capital so retained and the income thereof to be paid as aforesaid shall be alimentary, and shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of the son or sons of whose share or shares it is the income, nor by the diligence of their creditors, nor shall it be assignable except by a revocable deed mortis causa: And my trustees shall hold the shares of my daughters during their respective lives, and on the death of each shall pay her share to such person or persons as she may appoint by any revocable deed executed by her after she has attained the age of twenty-one years, and failing such appointment, then to her own nearest heirs: And my trustees shall pay half-yearly at Whitsunday or Martinmas the free income of the trust-estate to my children in proportion to the capital sum which may be due to each, the shares of income of such as are in minority being applied for their maintenance and education to such extent and in such way as my trustees may see best, and the shares of income of daughters after they attain majority being payable to themselves as alimentary provisions on their own receipts alone: But declaring that in the event of any one or more of my daughters being engaged to be married, my trustees shall have power to encroach on the share or shares of capital of residue of which such daughter may be receiving the income to an extent not exceeding £200 for each daughter who may be so engaged, to provide her with an outfit on her marriage: And I declare that the issue of such of my said children as may have predeceased leaving issue shall succeed to the share to which their parent would have been entitled if in life." The testator also provided as follows:—"And I further declare that the provisions herein contained in favour of my children are and shall be in full of all that they could claim by or through my decease in respect of legitim or any other claim competent to them, and also that the whole of the said provisions, whether of capital or income, so far as conceived in favour of or devolving upon females, shall be for their own sole and separate use, shall not be assignable by them or attachable for their debts or obligations, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband or husbands they may marry, and shall not be subject to the debts of such husbands or the diligence of their creditors."

A question having arisen between the trustees and the two daughters of the first marriage, who were the only daughters who had attained majority, with regard to their rights under the sixth purpose of the settlement, the present special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The parties to the special case were (1) the trustees, and (2) the two daughters who had attained majority.

The first parties maintained that under the sixth purpose of Mr Forrest's trust-disposition and settlement the right conferred upon his daughters with regard to their shares of residue consisted merely of an alimentary liferent, coupled with a power to test upon the capital of their shares, and that as trustees they were bound to retain the said shares for the purposes (1) of maintaining the alimentary character of the liferent, and (2) of preserving the capital for those who might be entitled thereto upon the death of the liferenters.

The second parties maintained that the trust-disposition and settlement conferred on them a vested right to the fee of the shares of residue bequeathed to them, and that they were entitled to immediate payment of their respective shares.

The questions of law were, inter alia, as follows:—"1. Under Mr Forrest's trust-disposition and settlement, are the second parties vested with a full right of fee in the shares of residue bequeathed to them? or, Are their rights limited to a right of liferent, coupled with a power to test on the capital of their shares?"

Argued for the second parties;—Under the provisions of the sixth purpose the daughters were entitled to the fee of a share of the residue vesting a morte testatoris, and to immediate payment thereof now.[1] In the case cited the trustees were directed to hold the daughters' shares and to pay them the income. There the daughters were given only a power of disposal in the way of family settlements. Here they were given a general power of disposal, and failing disposal their shares were to go to their heirs. In the declaration as to the provisions in favour of female children the testator used the words "whether of capital or income," shewing that the daughters' provisions were not meant to be liferents merely.

Argued for the first parties;—The case of Greenlees[1] was distinguished. In that case there was no ultimate destination of the fee. Here it was otherwise, for the fee was ultimately destined to the daughters' heirs. A mere direction to hold and pay income without any direction as to the disposal of the fee was doubtless not enough to overcome or limit an initial gift to children generally. But here the fee was disposed of. The trustees were directed to pay it to the daughters' testamentary or legal heirs. What was given to the daughters was a liferent with a limited, practically only a testamentary, power of disposal, with a destination, failing disposal, to heirs. Such a gift did not confer a right of fee. The daughters proposed that the destination to heirs should be ignored.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question which we have to decide is this:—What was the nature of the right conferred upon the daughters by the testator's trust-disposition and settlement. By the sixth purpose of his testamentary settlement he bequeathed the residue for behoof of all his children equally in general terms, not stating the quality of gift to the daughters, but he afterwards stated his intention with regard to them in detail. After dealing with the case of the sons he gave the following direction with respect to the shares of the daughters—"My trustees shall hold the shares of my daughters during their respective lives." This is an imperative direction to the trustees to hold the daughters' shares during their lives. It is quite inconsistent with payment being made to them during their lives. He did not give them a fee, and the gift is in sharp contrast to the gift made in favour of the sons. He, however, directed that on the death of each daughter her share should be paid "to such person or persons as she may appoint by any revocable deed." This confirms the view that no right of fee was given to the daughters. If a right of fee had been given to them, it would not have been necessary to direct that the fee should be paid to their appointees. The direction does not stop there, but there is a destination over, by which, "failing such appointment," each daughter's share is to be paid "to her own nearest heirs." The daughters' heirs do not take by succession to them, but as personæ prædilectæ to whom the testator gives an independent right. There is a further provision that "the shares of income of daughters after they attain majority" shall be "payable to themselves as alimentary provisions." This again emphasises the fact that they have no right of fee, they are only to receive the income of what are conveniently called their shares, and the income is declared to be alimentary. The testator further provides that "in the event of any one or more of my daughters being engaged to be married, my trustees shall have power to encroach on the share or shares of capital of residue of which such daughter may be receiving the income, to an extent not exceeding £200 for each daughter who may be so engaged, to provide her with an outfit on her marriage." The testator does not say "the share belonging to such daughter," but the share of capital "of which such daughter may be receiving the income"—that is to say, of which she is the liferentrix. Every line of the deed shews that the testator did not intend that the daughters should have any right to the fee, but only a liferent with a power of disposal "by revocable deed."

If your Lordships concur in this view, the first alternative of the first question will be answered in the negative and the second alternative in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It is the intention of the truster as expressed in the deed that we have to give effect to, and for that reason the construction of one testament serves to throw very little light on that of another. Still we must observe the rules of construction laid down in previous judgments. What then was the intention of the truster in this case? In executing a settlement a truster may give a fee, and then try to limit and restrict it, but such limitation and restriction will be of no effect if in fact he has given a fee. The question therefore here is, whether the testator has given a fee, for if so the restriction would be of no avail. The case resembles that of Greenlees' Trustees,[1] but differs from it in that there is no direction "to pay" to the daughters. The testator says, "I leave and bequeath the residue of my estate . . . for behoof of my children equally, and direct my trustees to pay over to each of my sons. . . ." While that is a distinct direction to pay to sons, there is no such direction in the case of daughters. Then the testator goes on to direct his trustees "to hold" the daughters' shares during their life, and to pay in a certain way on their death. We have therefore a direction to pay; but only when the daughters are dead. In this we have a clear direction as to the final disposal of the fee, and not as in Greenlees' case.[1] The trustees here are to pay the income to the daughters, and the fee to their testamentary or natural heirs. I think there can be no doubt that in this case there was no absolute fee given to daughters on the death of the testator; but that the fee was to be held until their death, and then to be disposed of as they should direct, and failing direction then to go to their heirs.

LORD M'LAREN.—This case touches, or at least comes very near to, a question that has been frequently commented on, and as to which I am not sure that the highest authorities are agreed. I mean as to the effect of a gift taking the form of an unqualified power to the grantee to dispose, when there is superadded a provision as to what is to be done in the event of the power not being exercised. Observations as to this are to be found in the case of Morris v. Tennant,[2] by Lord St Leonards, and in the case of Pursell v. Elder[3] by Lord Westbury. In Morris v. Tennant[2] Lord St Leonards had to deal with a liferent with power to dispose, either by will or by deed, and a destination-over in the event of failure to exercise the power. So the power there was a most general one, and the judgment of the House, supported by Lord St Leonards, was to the effect that a liferent with a power of disposal, however general, cannot be construed as a fee, if there is a destination-over in the event of failure to exercise it. But in the case of Pursell v. Elder[1] Lord Westbury said that to give a person an estate "with words indicative of the intention of the testator that he should have the absolute jus disponendi, then in any case these words are to be taken as indicating an intention that he should be the absolute owner." Lord Westbury does not directly deal with the case of a destination-over, perhaps because he was not quite in agreement with Lord St Leonards as to the effect of it.

In the present case it is hardly necessary to solve this troublesome question, for here we not only have a destination-over to heirs, but the power itself is not an unqualified power. It is a restricted power to the grantee to dispose of her share after her death by any revocable deed. This may include some deeds that are not strictly testamentary, but practically it means that what is here given is only a power to affect the succession to the estate, and not a power to disturb the trustees in the possession of it during the grantees' lives. The object of this limitation was no doubt that the income of the estate should thereby be secured to the beneficiaries. I have no doubt that under this instrument the daughters take only a liferent with a power to dispose mortis causa. I do not comment on the language of the disposition, because I agree with all that your Lordship and Lord Adam have said with regard to it.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

JOHN LAMBERT CADWALADER appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income-Tax Acts for the district of Brechin, in the county of Forfar, against an assessment made upon him under Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act for the year 1903-4. The assessment was made under authority of the Finance Act, 1903 (3 Edward VII. cap. 8), sec. 5; the Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2, Schedule D; and the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D, Cases Fourth and Fifth.*

The following were the facts as found or admitted:—"1. The appellant is an American citizen, and has his ordinary residence at No. 13 Thirty-fifth Street, New York, where he practises his profession as a barrister.

"2. By minute of lease entered into between the factors and commissioners for the Right Honourable the Earl of Dalhousie of the first part, and the appellant of the second part, dated 16th March and 2d and 3d April 1900, there was let to the appellant for the period of three years from 1st February 1900, at the yearly rent of £1500, payable in advance on 1st February yearly, All and Whole the sole and exclusive right of shooting and sporting over the grouse shootings of Millden, together with Millden Lodge and the furniture therein, and also with a right of fishing in the rivers and streams within the bounds of the territory, let, upon, inter alia, the conditions following: —(a) The furniture and other effects in the lodge and out-buildings were to be delivered over per inventory to the second party . . . (b) The first parties undertook to maintain the whole buildings wind and water tight, and to bear the expense of keeping in order the grounds attached to the lodge, to pay all rates and taxes imposed in respect of said tenancy, and also to pay the wages of a housekeeper and housemaid and one gamekeeper and a watcher, all of whose services should be at the disposal of the second party; (c) The shootings were to be under the entire management of the present keeper, or any other keeper to be appointed by the first parties, but the service of said keeper and under-keeper to be at the service of and under the control of the second party during the shooting season. . . .

"3. The said lease, a copy of which was put in and forms part of this case, was continued by agreement for one year, to 1st February 1904, and by subsequent agreement, dated 3d and 6th October 1903, the lease was renewed for a period of two years from 1st February 1904. . . .

Inland Revenue v. Cadwalader.

"4. The appellant is a bachelor. He and his valet, whom he brings with him from America, reside at Millden continuously for a period of two months each year during the grouse shooting season. He employs a caterer from London, who supplies all food and servants. . . . When the appellant takes possession of Millden, the housekeeper and housemaid remove from the lodge and do not return until he goes away. The female servants are paid board wages by the first parties.

"5. In the Valuation-roll of the county of Forfar the appellant is entered as tenant and occupier of the Millden shooting-lodge and shootings, and he is charged to all the local and imperial rates and taxes applicable to such occupancy, though the proprietor relieves him of these taxes under the provisions of the lease. . . .

"6. When the appellant or his friends are not living at Millden, the lodge is under the care of the female servants referred to in fact 2 (b), and is available for the appellant's return at any time.

"7. The appellant has no place of business in the United Kingdom.

"8. During the appellant's stay in the United Kingdom he maintains and keeps open for his return his residence in New York, to which he could have returned at any time. He also pays all taxes due by him in New York in respect of his dwelling-house or his profession.

"The appellant contended that he was not a person 'residing in the United Kingdom,' within the meaning of the Income-Tax Acts,* and quoted in support of his contention sec. 39 of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, Lloyd v. Sulley, Court of Exchequer, Scotland, 12th March 1884, 11 R., p. 687; and Colquhoun v. Brooks, House of Lords, (1889), 14 A. C. 493.

"The Surveyor of Taxes, on the other hand, contended that Lloyd v Sulley proved the appellant's liability, and in support of his contention that section 39 of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, did not exempt the appellant, he quoted The Attorney-General v. Coote (1817), 4 Price, 183, a decision given on section 51, 46 Geo. III. cap. 65, which was a provision similar to that contained in section 39 of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35."

On these facts the Commissioners, after hearing parties, "being of opinion that the appellant was not liable, sustained the appeal, and discharged the assessment."

The Surveyor of Taxes required the Commissioners to state a case, which they did, setting forth the facts given above.

Argued for the appellant;—The respondent was a person "residing in the United Kingdom" in the sense of section 2, Schedule D, of the Income-tax Act, 1853.[1] Domicile had nothing to do with the question of residence. A man could not have two domiciles at one time, but he might have many residences.[2] The authority of the case of Lloyd[2] upon this point had not been overruled. The respondent was not in Great Britain for some temporary purpose only, and accordingly, he was not within the exception contained in section 39 of the Income-tax Act, 1842.* The case of

Coote[1] was decided upon section 51 of the Act 46 Geo. III. cap. 65, but that section was in the same terms as section 39 of the Act of 1842. The respondent had a residence in the United Kingdom to which he could resort at any time, and the fact that he was absent for the greater part of the year did not prevent him from being a person residing in the United Kingdom.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—The word "residing" was defined in section 39,[3] and the respondent was within the exception contained in that section, because he was here for a temporary purpose only, with no intention of establishing his residence, and he had not resided for six months. "Residing" meant ordinarily residing.[4] The test of liability was not having a residence, it was actually residing in the United Kingdom.[5] The decision in Lloyd v. Inland Revenue[4] had been overruled by Colquhoun v. Brooks.[6] The question was one of intention,[7] and the respondent did not come to Scotland with the view of making it his ordinary residence.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether the appellant, Mr Cadwalader, is assessable to income-tax in respect of his occupancy of a house and shootings belonging to the Earl of Dalhousie at Millden, in Forfarshire.—(His Lordship narrated the facts set forth in the case.)

The answer to the question depends upon whether the appellant was, during the year of assessment, a "person residing in the United Kingdom," within the meaning of Schedule D of the Act of 1853, section 2. The appellant maintained that he was not a person "residing in the United Kingdom" within the meaning of that section, while the Surveyor of Taxes contended that he possessed that character, and the Commissioners sustained the appeal and discharged the assessment, whereupon the Surveyor of Taxes expressed his dissatisfaction with their determination, and required a case to be stated for the opinion of this Court.

I am of opinion that the decision of the Commissioners was erroneous, and that the appellant is assessable. He has, in effect, a lease of heritage in Scotland, he occupies personally the subjects let to him for a considerable portion of each year, and when he is absent in America these subjects are kept in readiness for his return. His occupation of the subjects is not of a casual or temporary character, but is substantial, and as regards some of its incidents it is continuous.

one time or several times for a period equal in the whole to six months in any one year, shall be charged with the said duties mentioned in Schedule D as a person residing in Great Britain, in respect of the profits or gains received from or out of . . . any foreign possessions . . . or foreign securities."

Inland Revenue v. Cadwalader.

Domicile has no bearing on the question, and where a person has in fact a residence in the United Kingdom, he is chargeable as a person residing there, although he may also have a residence, or residences, out of the United Kingdom—Lloyd v. Sulley.[1] In that case the Lord President said, "The only question which can be raised upon that" (the statute) "is whether Mr Lloyd was, for the year 1883-84, to which alone this case applies, residing in the United Kingdom. There is no mention in this taxing clause of the character of the residence as being ordinary residence, or temporary residence, or residence for any particular part of the year, or proportion of it, 'residing in the United Kingdom' are the only words we have to guide us." I am not leaving out of view that if or in so far as the case of Lloyd v. Sulley[1] may be held to be an authority for charging a person resident in the United Kingdom with duty in respect of the profits of a trade carried on exclusively abroad and not received in this country, it must be taken to have been overruled by the decision in Colquhoun v. Brooks,[2] but this does not, in my judgment, affect its authority for the purpose for which I now refer to it. The judgment in Lloyd v. Sulley[1] does not appear to have proceeded to any extent upon the fact of Mr Lloyd being a British subject.

A master mariner having a house in the United Kingdom in which, when at home, he resided personally, and in which, when he was absent, his wife and family continued to reside, was held liable to be assessed for income-tax as a "resident in the United Kingdom"—in re Young,[3] and the fact of his absence from the United Kingdom during the year of assessment was held not to relieve him from liability. If a person continues to have a residence in the United Kingdom, he is resident there in the sense of the Acts—Rogers v. Inland Revenue.[4] A person may have more than one residence, if he maintains an establishment at each of them. Further, it is not necessary that the trade or business, or other source of the income of the person sought to be charged, should be carried on or exercised in this country.

It was maintained on behalf of the appellant that his case fell within section 39 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, by which it is, inter alia, provided "that no person who shall on and after the passing of this Act actually be in Great Britain for some temporary purpose only, and not with any view or intent of establishing his residence therein, and who shall not actually have resided in Great Britain" (now the United Kingdom—see the Act of 1853, sec. 5), "at one time or several times for a period equal in the whole to six months in any one year, shall be charged with the said duties mentioned in Schedule D as a person residing in Great Britain, in respect of the profits or gains received from or out of any possessions in Ireland or any other of Her Majesty's dominions, or any foreign possessions, or from securities in Ireland or any other of Her Majesty's dominions, or foreign securities; but nevertheless every such person shall, after such residence in Great Britain for such space of time as aforesaid, be chargeable to the said duties for the year commencing on the 6th day of April preceding." This provision seems to be directed primarily to prevent temporary residents for less than six months in one year from being charged in respect of profits received from abroad, but it does not appear to me to apply to a case like the present. I do not think that the appellant can reasonably maintain that he is in the United Kingdom "for some temporary purpose only, and not with any view or intent of establishing his residence therein," in the sense of the section, as he took Millden with the view of residing there during a material part of each year, and maintaining his connection with it as tenant during the rest of the year, as he has a residence always ready for him if he should choose to come to it. It is not necessary in order to a person being chargeable that he shall have his sole residence in the United Kingdom. A man can reside in more countries than one, although he can only have one domicile.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the decision of the Commissioners was erroneous, and that the appellant is liable to the assessment in question, the amount of the assessment being, as was conceded, open to adjustment.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether the respondent was a person residing in the United Kingdom in such circumstances as to make him liable to assessment under Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act of 1853. The respondent is an American citizen, but that makes no difference in the application of the Act, as the Act says that any person residing in the United Kingdom shall be liable. Now, in order to reside, a person must have a residence, and the question is, what residence has the respondent here? He is tenant under a lease of some two or three years of Millden Lodge and shootings. Millden Lodge is a furnished house. It is kept up for him, and is placed at his disposal to go to at any time of the year he chooses. In fact, he has occupied it in the past, and probably will in the future, continuously for two months in each year, with all the comforts and necessaries of a man of wealth, as if it were his own house. That is the mode of residence of this gentleman. Can it be said that during, for example, these two months in which he is residing continuously in Millden Lodge, he is not residing there? Where is he residiug? He is residing, in my humble opinion, in Millden Lodge, and, therefore, residing in the United Kingdom; and if that be so, then it humbly appears to me that he is a person, in the sense of the Act, residing in the United Kingdom and assessable under the Act. We know that numerous persons have two houses with two residences in the United Kingdom, but in such a case as that the question does not arise, because, if they are residing in the United Kingdom, it does not matter what house they reside in. But when you come to a person who has one residence in this country and one residence abroad, what is to be said? It arose, as your Lordship has said, in the case of Lloyd.[1] There Mr Lloyd had a residence in this country of his own, because he had bought it, in which he resided for three and a half months in each year, but his business lay in Italy. He had his principal residence in Italy. Now, it was held that, although Mr Lloyd had this other residence in which he resided part of the year in Italy, he had a residence in Scotland where he resided three and a half months, and he was found liable to be assessed, and, as your Lordship has said, that case is not, so far as I am aware, questioned in that respect. There is another case from Ireland, which was in the position of a foreign kingdom at the date of the Act in respect of the income-tax, because I understand Ireland was not made assessable, and that was the case of Coote.[1] There this Irish gentleman, who had his residence in Ireland, came over to London, acquired a house, and set up an establishment there. It appears that he resided the whole year in Ireland except for ten weeks, and there was a case of two residences, one in a district which was subject to income-tax, and one in Ireland which was not; but the Court held that he nevertheless was residing in England for a certain time of the year. Now, I confess I cannot draw a distinction between the ten weeks in Coote's case[1] and the three and a half months in Lloyd's case,[2] and the two months in this case. In this case there is residence in each country, and it is not a question of principal residence at all. It is simply a question of residence in this country. Is the person residing in this country? In my humble opinion Mr Cadwalader was residing in this country and was liable to assessment. That is, unless his case comes under section 39 of the Act of 1842, and I do not think it does. What that Act says is this,—"That no person who shall after the passing of this Act actually be in Great Britain for some temporary purpose only, and not with any view or intent of establishing his residence therein," and so on. Now, there might have been a question whether coming here to shoot for a few months in the year was to be considered, under the construction of this Act, as a temporary purpose. I should have thought it was not, because evidently this part of the Act applies to much more temporary purposes than that; but, then, in the next sentence it says "for some temporary purpose only and not with any view or intent of establishing his residence therein." If we are right, then it was with the view of establishing his residence that Mr Cadwalader came to this country. On these grounds I agree with your Lordship.

Lord M'Laren.—I think the important question in this case is whether Mr Cadwalader comes within the exempting clause, because, if he does not come within the exemption there is the strong presumption, supported, think, by previous decisions, that the general enacting words are broad enough to apply to his case. Now, the exemption is one that walks upon two legs. It is, first, that the party is here for a temporary purpose only; and secondly, that he is here not with a view or intent of establishing a residence. If the argument is lame in one of the limbs, then the party does not get the benefit of the exemption, because he is not able to affirm both members of the double proposition. There might, I think, be a possible room for difference of opinion as to the meaning of the words "view or intent of establishing a residence." The words are somewhat vague, but they seem to me to recognise what may be called a constructive residence as distinguished from actual residence. It is that you may take a house or country place with a view or an intention of establishing a residence, although you may not have had time to become a resident. Yet if you are looking forward to it, apparently that makes you liable to taxation, because in order to get the benefit of the exemption you must be able to say that you have no view and no intention of acquiring a residence. But, then, I think for the purposes of the present case the first point in the exempting clause is sufficient, because I do not think that Mr Cadwalader is in a position to affirm, when he comes year after year during the currency of his lease to spend the shooting season in Scotland, that he is here for a temporary purpose only. I do not mean that you might not frame a definition which would bring this within the scope of temporary purposes, but, taking the ordinary meaning of the word, I should say that temporary purposes means casual purposes as distinguished from the case of a person who is here in the pursuance of his regular habits of life. Temporary purpose means the opposite of continuous and permanent residence. Nobody ever supposed that you must reside twelve months in the year in order to be liable for income-tax, and therefore "temporary" does not mean the negation of perpetuity, but means that it is casual or transitory residence as distinguished from a residence (of which there may be more than one), which is habitual or permanent. I agree with all that has been said by your Lordships, and I think the decision in this case must be in favour of the Crown.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

THE COURT reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and sustained the assessment.

AT a Registration Court for the burgh of St Andrews, held on 5th October 1904, Thomas Ireland, cabinetmaker, 23 Market Street, St Andrews, claimed to be entered on the list of voters for the burgh as a lodger.

The particulars of the qualification set forth in the notice of claim were as follows:—

| Christian Name and Surname at Full Length. | Profession, Trade, or Calling. | Description of Lodgings. | Description of House or Houses in which Lodgings situate, with number, if any, and Name of Street. | Name, Description, and Residence of Persons or Person to whom Rent Paid. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Thomas Ireland. | Cabinet-maker. | Bedroom and use of Public Room. | Dwelling-house, 23 Market Street, St Andrews. | Mrs Jessie Ireland, Widow, 23 Market Street, St Andrews. |

The declaration annexed to the claim was in the following terms:—"I, the above-named Thomas Ireland, hereby declare that I have been, during the twelve months immediately preceding the last day of July in this year, the occupier as lodger tenant of the above-mentioned lodgings, and that I have resided therein during the twelve months immediately preceding the said last day of July; and that such lodgings are of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards.

"Signature of Claimant, THOMAS IRELAND."

This declaration was in the form given in Schedule (I.) annexed to the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, except that the words "lodger tenant" in the claimant's declaration were substituted for the words "sole tenant" in the statutory declaration.

Alexander Barr, a voter on the roll, objected to the claim on the ground that the claimant was not a lodger in the sense of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 4,* in respect that he did not occupy the rooms claimed for separately and as a sole tenant.

The Sheriff (Mackenzie, K.C.) admitted the claim, and at the request of the objector stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"The Sheriff found the facts to be as follows:—That the claimant, who was the only witness examined, had, for the qualifying period under contract with his mother, the said Mrs Jessie Ireland, the right to occupy as a lodger the said bedroom, with board and use of public room; that for this the claimant paid 20s. per week; that there are three rooms in the house and five of a family; that other members of the family use the public room. No evidence was led as to the rental of the house, or as to the value of the bedroom and the use of public room separately, nor was there any evidence adduced that anyone but the claimant used the bedroom."

No appearance was made for the claimant.

Dunlop v. Mackenzie.

The Sheriff-substitute (MacLachlan) disallowed the claim, on the ground stated by the objector, and at the request of the claimant stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following were the facts:—"1. That the claimant is true owner of houses, lands, and heritages at Oban Hill and Glencruitten Road, within the limits of the Parliamentary burgh of Oban. 2. That these houses, lands, and heritages exceed £10 in annual value. 3. That the claimant has been owner of these subjects for several years prior to 31st July 1904, and his ownership continued up to 30th September 1904, the date of the Registration Court. 4. That the burgh of Oban is one of the Western District of Burghs—the other burghs being Ayr, Irvine, Campbeltown, and Inveraray. 5. That the claimant has resided within seven miles of the burgh boundary of the Parliamentary burgh of Ayr for six months continuously preceding the 31st day of July 1904, and such residence has continued up to the date of the Registration Court, namely, 30th September 1904."

The question of law was,—"Upon the facts above set forth is residence within seven miles of the boundary of a Parliamentary burgh forming one of a district of burghs for six months prior to 31st July preceding the date of the Registration Court, and residence up to the date of the Registration Court, combined with ownership of property of the annual value of £10 within another burgh of the district, sufficient to entitle a claimant to have his name inserted in the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a Member for the said district of burghs in the burgh in which said property is situate?"

Argued for the appellant;—By section 59 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, "burgh" was defined to include "district of burghs," and consequently the seven miles might be measured from any of the burghs comprised in the particular district, although the property belonging to the claimant might be in another the premises actually occupied by them should be of less yearly value than £10. . . ."

The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), enacts:—

Sec. 59. "The following terms shall in this Act have the meanings hereinafter assigned to them, unless there is something in the context repugnant to such construction; that is to say," inter alia:—

> "'Burgh' shall mean any city, town, burgh, or district of cities, towns, or burghs returning a member or members to serve in Parliament."

The Burgh Voters Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 58), enacts,—

Sec. 34. "The distance of seven statute miles in the first-recited Act mentioned" [the Act of 1832], "and therein prescribed, as to the residence of voters for any burgh, shall be understood to be the distance of seven miles as measured in a straight line on the horizontal plane from any point from which such distance is to be measured according to the direction in that behalf given in the said Act. . . ."

The Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 23), enacts,—

Sec. 13, subsec. (3). "For the purpose of determining the distance of the residence of any voter, and for all purposes of and incidental to the registration of voters in a Parliamentary borough divided into divisions, and for the purpose of the enactments respecting the division of any such borough into polling districts, all the divisions shall be deemed to form the same Parliamentary borough."

of the burghs. The Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, section 13, subsection (3), proceeded on this principle. No. 28.

The argument for the respondent sufficiently appears from the opinions.[1] Nov. 25, 1904. Dunlop v. Mackenzie.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right. The statute entitles a person to be registered as a voter who is the true owner of premises of the yearly value of £10 within the burgh wherein the vote is claimed. It is provided, however, that no such person shall be entitled to be registered unless he shall have resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July in any year within the limits of such burgh, or within seven miles of some part thereof. The question is, what is meant by "such burgh"? I think it means the burgh in which the claim to be registered is made, and that this provision is not affected by the interpretation clause of the 1868 Act. The interpretation clause requires us to construe the term used in the particular clause with reference to the context. A district of burghs is not a specific locality from which it is possible to measure distances. It means a number of burghs grouped together for the purpose of electing a member of Parliament. But the burghs are still locally separate, and a man who is living within seven miles of one of them is not therefore within seven miles of another. The conditions of the present case therefore do not comply with the statutory requirements, and I think the decision of the Sheriff ought to be affirmed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I have no doubt about the effect of section 11 of the 1832 Act. The section requires residence within seven miles of the burgh in which the vote is claimed, and I do not think that the provisions of the section have been affected or extended by the definition clause of the Act of 1868.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I agree. I think the words of the interpretation clause in the Act of 1868 do not apply to the provision in the Act of 1832.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

Registration Appeal Court. Lord Kinnear. Lord Trayner. Lord Kincairney.

AT a Registration Court for the county of Peebles, held on 8th October 1904, George Urquhart, foreman joiner, Talla, Tweedsmuir, claimed to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the counties of Peebles and Selkirk as tenant of house at Talla, Tweedsmuir, in the county of Peebles.

David Daniel Adam, a voter on the list, objected.

The Sheriff-substitute (Orphoot) rejected the claim, and at the request of the claimant stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"It was admitted or proved that George Urquhart had been and was in the service of John Best, contractor for the Talla Water-Works, as a foreman joiner, and had occupied a dwelling-house belonging to John Best at Talla, in the county of Peebles, for the qualifying period; that the terms upon which the workmen were engaged by their employer Mr Best to work at Talla were these:—When the contract of employment was made and their wages fixed, the workman was asked if he wished to get a house at Talla, and upon stating that he did, he was told that he would get one. It was agreed that 5s. a week as the rent of the house and as the price of coal to be supplied to him should be deducted from his wages fortnightly, and that sum was deducted from his wages during the qualifying period. Nothing was said on either side as to notice to be given on terminating the employment or as to quitting the house. The employer and the workman admitted that upon neither side was previous notice of terminating the employment required. By both parties that contract was terminable at pleasure. This arrangement was common on public works, and it was preferred by both parties. Both parties admitted that on the termination of the contract of employment by either party the house was at once to be vacated by the employee, but it was the custom of the employer, provided their houses were not required by him, to give as matter of favour married workmen a few days in which to remove their families and effects from the houses. Only workmen in Mr Best's employment occupied his houses at Talla. The premises upon which the qualification is claimed are not entered in the Valuation-roll.

"In these circumstances, the agent for the appellant contended that the said George Urquhart was entitled to have his name inserted in the said list of voters for the county of Peebles under the Service Franchise, introduced by section 3 of 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3, or, alternatively, under the Household Franchise for counties, introduced by sections 2 and 7 (4) of said Act.*

Urquhart v. Adam.

"Counsel for the objector maintained—(1) that the said George Urquhart occupied his house, not in virtue of his service or employment, but in respect that he paid rent for said house, and that therefore he was not entitled to be enrolled in said list under section 3 of said Act; and (2) that he was not an inhabitant occupier as tenant in respect that his occupation was contingent upon his employment; that he could be dismissed from such employment at any time, and put out of said house simul ac semel with such dismissal, and therefore his title being defeasible at any time, he was not entitled to be enrolled under sections 2 and 7 (4) of said Act.

"I sustained both objections, and I therefore rejected said claim."

The questions of law were:—"Whether the said George Urquhart possesses the qualification created by the Act 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3, sec. 3, and is therefore entitled to have his name inserted in the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the counties of Peebles and Selkirk, or if he is not so entitled, whether the said George Urquhart is entitled to have his name inserted in said list, in respect that he is an inhabitant occupier as tenant of the premises claimed upon and so qualified, in terms of the said Act, 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3, secs. 2 and 7, subsec. 4, and Acts therein mentioned?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The claimant occupied the house in virtue of a contract of employment and nothing else, and consequently he was entitled to be enrolled in virtue of sec. 3 of the Act of 1884. The fact that a small sum weekly was deducted from his wages in respect of his occupancy of the house did not alter the character of the occupancy.[1] (2) If, however, the claimant was to be regarded as a tenant, the fact that he had occupied as tenant for the

The Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3), enacts:—

Sec. 2. "A uniform household franchise and a uniform lodger franchise at elections shall be established in all counties and burghs throughout the United Kingdom, and every man possessed of a household qualification or a lodger qualification shall, if the qualifying premises be situated in a county in England or Scotland, be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at an election for such county. . . ."

Sec. 3. "Where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act and of the Representation of the People Acts to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant."

Sec. 7, subsec. 4. "The expression a 'household qualification' means, as respects Scotland, the qualification enacted by the 3d section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, and the enactments amending or affecting the same, and the said section and enactments shall, so far as they are consistent with this Act, extend to counties in Scotland, and for the purpose of the said section and enactments the expression 'dwelling-house' in Scotland means any house or part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, and this definition of a dwelling-house shall be substituted for the definition contained in section 59 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868."

qualifying period was enough to entitle him to be enrolled under sec. 2 and sec. 7, subsec. 4, of the Act of 1884. It might be that his tenure was defeasible, but he was not a mere squatter, as in Campbell v. MacLachlan. [1]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) To entitle a man to be enrolled under sec. 3 of the Act of 1884, he must occupy the house in virtue of an "office, service, or employment," [2] and the claimant occupied his house in virtue of payment of 5s. a week, which made his title of occupancy that of a tenant. (2) The claimant as a tenant was not entitled to be enrolled under sec. 2 and sec. 7, subsec. 4, of the Act, for his tenancy was defeasible at the will of his employer.[3]

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The appellant in this case claims to be registered as tenant of a house at Talla, in the county of Peebles. The facts on which the question in dispute arises are that he had agreed to serve as a foreman joiner in the employment of Mr John Best, contractor for the Talla Water Works; that when the amount of his wages had been fixed, it was further agreed that he should occupy a dwelling-house belonging to his employer, that five shillings a week should be deducted from his wages fortnightly as the rent of the house and as the price of coal to be supplied to him, and that he should vacate the house on the termination of the contract of employment by either party. In terms of this agreement he had occupied the house for the qualifying period.

In these circumstances he bases his claim, firstly, on section 3 of the Act of 1884, and secondly and alternatively on section 2 and section 7, subsection 4, of the same Act. The Sheriff has held that he is not entitled under the first of these enactments because he has not occupied his house by virtue of a service or employment; and that he is not entitled under the second because his title of occupation was defeasible, inasmuch as it is dependent upon the continuance of a contract of employment which was terminable at the pleasure of the employer. This last objection is admitted to be inapplicable if the first ground of claim is established; and the first question argued therefore was whether on the facts stated the appellant must be held to have occupied by virtue of employment or by virtue of an ordinary verbal lease for payment of rent. I think it unnecessary to decide between these conflicting views, because in either case I am of opinion that the appellant has a good claim as tenant.

Some unnecessary confusion has been introduced into the discussion by what I think an inaccurate use of language in the appellant's statement of his case as a claim under what he calls the service franchise, or alternatively under the household franchise for counties. These are not two different franchises. There is only one household franchise enacted by the statute of 1884 on which he founds; and the question is whether his claim to that franchise can be supported. The second section of the statute enacts that a uniform household franchise shall be established in all counties and burghs throughout the United Kingdom, and that every man possessed of a household qualification shall be entitled to be registered as a voter. The seventh section, subsection 4, defines the expression "household qualification" to mean, as respects Scotland, the qualification enacted by the third section of the Representation of the People Act, 1868; and that qualification is that a man of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity is and has been for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house. So far, therefore, all that the claimant has to prove is that at the time when the Sheriff proceeded to consider his right to be inserted in the register of voters he was an inhabitant occupier as tenant of his dwelling-house at Talla, and that his occupation of the house as the tenant had endured for twelve months preceding the last day of July. The third section of the Act of 1884, which is supposed to introduce a new and different franchise, seems to me to do no more than define the franchise already enacted by the second section so as to make it include a particular case which had not previously been held to fall within the language of the Act of 1868. It enacts that "where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves, he shall be deemed for the purposes of the Representation of the People Acts to be an 'inhabitant occupier' of such dwelling-house as a tenant." What the claimant has to prove, therefore, is still inhabitant occupancy as a tenant for the qualifying period and nothing more. He may establish his right in that character by proving that he has occupied by virtue of a service or employment, or by proving that he has occupied by virtue of an ordinary contract of lease for the payment of rent. But in either case the only condition he has to satisfy beyond proving his title of tenancy is to shew that he has in fact occupied the house as inhabitant for twelve months before the last day of July. It is conceded that this is enough if his title of tenancy is a contract of service or employment. In that case it is admittedly of no consequence that his occupancy may be terminable on the termination of his employment, as indeed it must be if he occupies by virtue of his employment alone.

But it is maintained, and the Sheriff has held, that an additional condition of indefeasibility of title is required if he occupies as tenant not under a contract of employment but under a lease. I think this distinction is baseless. What is required is tenancy for the prescribed period, and I am unable to find any reason for holding that a condition which is admittedly consistent with tenancy in the sense of the statute when it attaches to a contract of employment is yet fatal to the statutory conception of tenancy when it is found in a direct contract of lease. The conditions which the statute requires are, first, that the man must be an inhabitant occupier as tenant at the time when his claim is considered, and secondly, that he must have been so for a period of twelve months. If these two conditions are satisfied there is nothing in the statute to suggest that he is disqualified by reason of his title of occupancy having been potentially defeasible, if it has not been in fact defeated during the prescribed period of possession. If it has stood as a valid title for that period, there is no ground for inquiry as to the risks to which it may possibly have been exposed in events which have not happened.

I will only add with reference to the cases cited by the respondent's counsel that the authority of Rose v. Grant [1] and other cases, in which it was held that occupancy under a contract of service could not qualify as a tenant, appears to me to be displaced by the third section of the Act of 1884; and on the other hand that Campbell v. M'Lachlan [2] is not in point, because it decided only that possession by virtue of no title or contract whatever was not occupation as a tenant. There is nothing in the view I have stated to imply that a merely precarious possession without any title at all is equivalent to tenancy either under a lease or a contract of employment; and so far as they only negative that suggestion the previous cases are not altered by the new Act.

If your Lordships take the same view, I would propose that we should not answer the question put to us in the terms in which it is stated, but that we should find that the appellant has a qualification as inhabitant occupier as a tenant, and remit to the Sheriff to insert his name in the register.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, sustain the same; recall the judgment appealed against; remit to the Sheriff to add the name of George Urquhart, foreman joiner, Talla, Tweedsmuir, to the roll of voters for the counties of Peebles and Selkirk as tenant of the house at Talla aforesaid," with a finding as to expenses.

Parent and Child—Petition for custody of child—Process—Respondent obstructing execution of service.—In a petition by a father for the custody of his infant child against his father-in-law, in whose possession the child was alleged to be, the latter deliberately obstructed and prevented service of the petition upon him. 1st DIVISION. JAMES BUSBY, machinist, 2 Union Place, Dalmuir, Dumbartonshire, presented a petition for the custody of his infant child, Thomas Clark Busby, against James Clark, Dalmuir, the petitioner's father-in-law.

The petitioner averred that on 2d October 1904 his wife gave birth to the child in question; that his wife died on 9th October 1904; that after her death the child was carried off by the petitioner's mother-in-law, and had since been residing in the custody of the petitioner's father-in-law, James Clark, watchman, 7 Gladstone Place, Dalmuir; that the petitioner was desirous of having the custody of his child, but Clark, although he had been asked by the petitioner and his agent on four different occasions to hand over the child, refused to do so.

The petitioner further averred that since his wife's death he had resided in family with his mother and stepfather; that his wages were 33s. per week; and that his stepfather and mother were willing to receive the child, and do their best for its welfare.

The petitioner accordingly craved the Court to find that he was entitled to the custody of his child, and to ordain James Clark to deliver up the child to the petitioner, or to any other person having his authority.

On 24th November 1904 the Court ordered intimation and service of the petition.

On 30th November counsel for the petitioner, in the Single Bills, stated to the Court that an attempt had been made to serve the petition upon Clark by registered letter, but the letter had been returned by the post-office to the Clerk of the process, marked "Absolutely refused." An attempt had then been made to serve the petition personally on Clark, but a telegram had been received from the messenger-at-arms in these terms:—"Have been unable to effect service to-night."

Counsel for the petitioner moved the Court to grant the prayer of the petition in respect the matter was urgent, and Clark had deliberately obstructed service of the petition.

No appearance was made for Clark.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the respondent has obstructed and prevented service, and as he has taken no steps to explain or justify his conduct, I think that we should grant decree of custody as craved.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree. The obstruction here was directed not only against receiving a registered letter, but also against allowing personal service. It seems to me, therefore, that the respondent was deliberately avoiding service, and that decree of custody should therefore be granted.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

No. 31.

Nov. 30, 1904. Stewart v. Chalmers.

1st Division.

The late Peter Stewart, of the Kinnoull Arms Inn, Perth, who died on 6th January 1897, by his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 3d October 1892, conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to John Stewart, Thomas Chalmers, and James Harper, all solicitors in Perth, as trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. The trustees were given power to sell, power to assume new trustees, and power to appoint one of themselves to be factor or agent. The three trustees named all accepted office. John Stewart acted as law-agent of the trust until his death, on 12th February 1904. At that date James Harper having also died, Thomas Chalmers was the only surviving trustee. On 7th March 1904 Chalmers assumed as trustees George Robert Douglas, painter, Perth, and Robert Stewart, solicitor, Perth, a nephew of the testator, and they both accepted office. On 10th March 1904 Robert Stewart, who had succeeded to John Stewart's business, was appointed law-agent of Peter Stewart's trust. On 18th April 1904 George Robert Douglas resigned office as a trustee.

In September 1904 Mrs Mary Ann Munro or Stewart, widow of Peter Stewart, and his children, being the whole beneficiaries interested in the trust-estate, presented a petition for the removal of Thomas Chalmers from the office of trustee, or otherwise for the appointment by the Court of John Anderson Stewart, solicitor, Perth, and John Munro, jeweller, Perth, or such other person or persons as the Court might think fit, to be trustees or trustee.

The petitioners averred that at Whitsunday 1904 there was in the hands of the trustees a large sum available for investment, consisting mainly of a sum of £4410, being the price realised by the sale as at that term of the Kinnoull Arms Inn; that upon Robert Stewart, in April 1904, proposing that provision should be made for investing the trust funds, Thomas Chalmers, on 21st April 1904, had written:—"As your position and mine as trustees are now equal, I am to insist on half fees for all business to be done by you for this trust. On hearing from you that you agree to this condition I will consider the question of investing the trust funds"; that he had adhered to this position, and had continued to hinder trust investments, and to obstruct the administration of the trust; that he had also refused to assume new trustees, although the names of two persons who were willing to act were put before him, and had refused to resign office as a trustee; that his whole conduct had been improper and unjustifiable and hurtful to the interest of the beneficiaries; and that he had persisted in preferring his own personal interests to those of the trust.

In support of these averments the petitioners founded upon certain letters, the material portions of which are quoted in the opinion of the Lord President.

Thomas Chalmers lodged answers, in which he expressed regret for the terms of the letter of 21st April 1904, in which he had made the demand for half fees. He explained that his firm were agents in John Stewart's trust; that Robert Stewart, who had succeeded to John Stewart's business, was aggrieved at not being appointed agent in John Stewart's trust; that he had proposed to the respondent that if the respondent's firm were to be agents he should receive one half of their fees; and that it was with this in his mind, and irritated by the tone of Robert Stewart's letters, that he had written the letter of 21st April. He also stated that notwithstanding that letter he did not impede the work of the trust or decline to consider investments; that accordingly on 13th May 1904 he signed the disposition of the Kinnoull Arms Inn; and that with regard to the only investment submitted to him he considered it, and disapproved it in respect that the valuation of the security was obtained for the borrower, and was greatly too high, and that at its real value the security did not shew the requisite one-third margin.

From the letters it appeared that when the investment referred to was submitted to the respondent he did not state any of the objections now put forward, but merely wrote that he disapproved of it without assigning any reason.

Argued for the petitioners;—The respondent's conduct here had been such as to justify his removal from office. He had obstructed the business of the trust in order to compel assent to his proposal that he should get half fees for the work done by the law-agent of the trust. When he refused to approve the investment submitted to him he did not suggest the objections now stated, or intimate that he was prepared to approve an investment if a proper one was found.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent admitted that his letter, making the claim for half fees, was unjustifiable and regrettable, but it was never seriously meant, and was not acted upon, as he considered the only investment submitted to him and disapproved it for sufficient reasons. In order to justify the extreme step of removing a trustee there must be conduct amounting to decided malversation of office,[1] and there was nothing of that kind here.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition at the instance of Mrs Stewart and others, for the removal of Thomas Chalmers, solicitor, Perth, from the office of trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Peter Stewart, who was the husband of the leading petitioner, dated 3d October 1892. It is always a serious thing to remove a trustee, and it is not done without good and sufficient reason. But I am clearly of opinion that the conduct of the respondent has been of such a character as to make it unsuitable, if not unsafe, that he should be allowed any longer to remain one of the trustees under this trust.

The trustees nominated in the trust-disposition and settlement were three in number, all solicitors in Perth, and after the death of the truster on 6th January 1897, all the persons nominated trustees accepted office. The trust was not a large one, and there need not have been any difficulty in its administration if everyone connected with it had been reasonably desirous of doing his duty, and not of making profit out of it for himself.

The incidents with which we have specially to deal began in the month of April 1904, when Robert Stewart, who after the death of the respondent's two original co-trustees was assumed as a trustee, and was appointed law-agent to the trust, wrote to the respondent what seems to me to have been a perfectly proper letter expressing his desire to consult him as his co-trustee in regard to the investment of the trust-estate. The respondent's answer to that letter was not of a proper or I hope of a usual character. He said in it "As your position and mine as trustees are now equal, I am to insist on half fees for all business to be done by you for this trust. On hearing from you that you agree to this condition, I will consider the question of investing the trust funds." The ruling consideration to which the respondent refers was not the interest of the trust but of the respondent himself. He insists on receiving half fees for which he had not given and was not to give any professional service, and he makes payment of this indefensible claim a condition of his attending to the business of the trust which he had accepted. It would be difficult to conceive of anything more improper than this proposal, that a trustee should make a profit out of the execution of his trust and at its expense. He insists that if he allows Mr Stewart to receive professional fees for work done by him (Stewart) for the trust, the respondent shall receive half of them. I have seldom known of anything more improper than this proposal by a trustee, that he be allowed to pocket a portion of the trust funds. The proposal was quite indefensible, and shews that the respondent is unfit to be trusted with the position of a trustee. Mr Stewart's reply to the respondent's proposal was this:—"I am not aware that a gratuitous trustee is entitled to sacrifice the interests of the beneficiaries to his own. I certainly have no intention of being a party to such a bargain."

The correspondence goes on and Mrs Stewart wrote on 4th May to the respondent, suggesting that two new trustees should be assumed. And on 6th May the respondent replied that he could not see his way to agree to assume new trustees at present, and on the same date he wrote to Mr Stewart that he had objection to assume any new trustees at present, and upon being asked by Mr Stewart what his objection was, he wrote on 7th May that he did "not feel called upon to give you any further reason for refusing to assume new trustees." I do not know what his reason could have been unless to create a deadlock in the management of the trust with the view of concussing the trustees to allow him to receive half the fees payable to the agent of the trust.

On 6th May Mrs Stewart wrote to the respondent,—"My nephew Mr Robert Stewart informs me that you insist on getting half fees for all the business to be done in my late husband's trust, and unless he agrees to the conditions you will not consider the question of investing the trust funds; I do not consider this any reason for delaying the business of the trust." In reply to this letter the respondent wrote expressing regret that he could not discuss with Mrs Stewart the question to which she refers, "which is entirely a personal one between Mr Robert Stewart and myself." If anything had been necessary to shew that the respondent's object was to get a private profit for himself out of the trust funds, this last letter would have been sufficient to do so. The respondent said that if he was not allowed to commit a breach of trust, he would bring the trust to a deadlock. When Mr Robert Stewart wrote on 14th May suggesting a particular investment, the respondent replied:—"I do not approve of this investment"; but he gave no reason for his disapproval. When on 22d June he wrote, asking Mr Robert Stewart to arrange for a meeting of trustees for the purpose of appointing a law-agent, he said nothing about the proposed investment or his objections to it, and he made no suggestion in regard to it.

I do not think it is necessary to go further into the details of this case, except to repeat that the position taken up by the respondent was quite indefensible, and that he not only displayed a total disregard of the benefit of the trust, but also acted in a way contrary to its interests and calculated to bring it to a deadlock, all for the purpose of getting some of the trust funds for himself. If he thought Mr Stewart was acting wrongly with regard to the investment, it was his duty to say so, and to take steps for obtaining a proper investment, but instead of doing this he sought to prevent anything at all being done. Such an attitude on his part was quite indefensible, and it appears to me that the proper course is to remove him from the office of trustee.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it would have been incompetent for Mr Chalmers to make an arrangement with his co-trustee, if the beneficiaries did not object, that they should act as joint law-agents to the trust. Although such an arrangement would be unusual I cannot think that, if it were entered into by agreement between the parties, it would be open to objection on the grounds argued. But here Mr Chalmers' proposal was that he should receive half the fees earned by the law-agent to the trust, and this demand he attempted to enforce by taking up an attitude of obstruction towards the administration of the trust until his demand should be complied with. I think such an attitude as this, insisted upon as it has been here, is quite sufficient to justify the present application to the Court for his removal.

I cannot accept the explanations offered as in any way sufficient. The respondent can have been under no misapprehension as to the nature of his proposal, for every law-agent knows perfectly well that he is not entitled to make a profit for himself as trustee out of the administration of the trust. The attitude of the respondent here towards the trust seems to have amounted simply to the desire to make what money he could out of the trust funds for distribution among the lawyer trustees. If then responsible and suitable persons are willing to act as trustees, I think that the respondent should be removed from his position and new trustees be appointed. It is never a good thing that a trust should be left in the hands of a sole trustee, and, whatever confidence the Court may have in the ability and the integrity of the remaining trustee, it is always unwilling to bring about such a state of affairs.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with your Lordship in the chair and with Lord M'Laren, and I would only add that I do not think that the removal of this trustee for the conduct that has been brought to our notice should depend in any way on arrangements being made for the assumption of new trustees, but that he should be displaced at once irrespective of the new assumption. At the same time I quite agree that it would be well that arrangements should be made to prevent the trust falling into the administration of a sole trustee.

ON 22d November 1904 the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Remove the said Thomas Chalmers from the office of trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Peter Stewart of the Kinnoull Arms Inn, Perth, dated 3d October 1892, and decern: Find the said Thomas Chalmers liable in the expenses of the petition and the procedure following thereon, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report: Further continue the cause to allow Robert Stewart, the remaining trustee, to lodge in process the deed of assumption to be executed by him in favour of the two persons whose names are suggested in the petition."

On 30th November 1904 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords in respect that there has now been lodged in process the deed of assumption (No. 47 of process) referred to in the foregoing interlocutor, find it is no longer necessary to continue the cause."

1ST EDINBURGH CITY ROYAL GARRISON ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS AND LIEUT.-COLONEL JAMES FRANCIS MACKAY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Dundas—Pitman.

Limitation of Action—Public Authorities—Process—Commencement of Action—Colonel Commanding Volunteer Regiment—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 1.—The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, enacts, inter alia, that any action, prosecution, or other proceeding against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months after the act complained of.

In an action for damages against a regiment of volunteers and against the officer commanding the regiment, as representing the regiment, and as an individual, by the father of a child, who was killed on the public street by an ammunition waggon, the horses of which had bolted, the pursuer averred that the accident had been caused by the fault of the commanding officer in not seeing that quiet horses were used, that competent drivers were employed, that the waggons were driven according to military regulations, and that a competent commissioned officer was present to superintend the parade.

The action was not raised within six months after the date of the accident.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) dismissed the action as against the regiment and its commanding officer as representing it, on the ground that the funds of the regiment belonged to the Crown, and that the Crown could not be sued for damages caused by the wrongful acts of its officers, and allowed a proof before answer as against the commanding officer as an individual.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy on the last point) that the action against the commanding officer, as an individual, was excluded by the statute, on the ground that the fault averred against him was neglect of duty in his public capacity as commanding officer.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

ON 27th November 1903 William Brown Wilson, tramway inspector, 7 Kemp Place, Edinburgh, raised an action against the 1st Edinburgh City Royal Garrison Artillery Volunteers, and James Francis Mackay, Lieutenant-Colonel commanding the regiment, for himself, and as representing the regiment, concluding for payment of £500 as damages for the death of his child.

No. 32.

Nov. 30, 1904.
Wilson v. 1st Edinburgh City Royal Garrison Artillery Volunteers.

The pursuer averred that on 14th March 1903 his child, aged six, while standing on an island platform, opposite the Lothian Road Board School, was knocked down and killed by an ammunition waggon belonging to the defenders and drawn by two horses hired by them, which came from the direction of Grindlay Street, at a furious and runaway pace.

The pursuer further averred, inter alia:—(Cond. 1) "The parade of 14th March 1903 was not a parade for military purposes. It was what is called a 'march-out'—that is, a parade of the guns, &c., on the public streets merely for the purpose of attracting public attention, and thereby securing recruits to the corps. The 'march-out' is not a parade which the members of the corps are required to attend, and no drill or instruction are given at it." (Cond. 4) "It was the duty of Colonel Mackay to take special precautions for the public safety. In particular, it was said defender's duty to see—(1) That quiet horses, suitable for such work, should be used; (2) that experienced and competent drivers able to control the horses drawing the guns and ammunition waggons were employed; and (3) that the arrangements for harnessing the horses to the guns and waggons, and parading them on the streets, should be superintended by a commissioned officer of experience familiar with such work. But these duties the said defender disregarded: as, having issued his orders for the 'march-out,' which his subordinates were bound to carry out, he left the entire control to the non-commissioned officers and men of the volunteer regiment." (Cond. 5) "In point of fact, the horses which the said defender instructed to be used were wholly unaccustomed to such work, and had never been previously engaged in it. . . . The said defender took no steps to ascertain the suitability of the horses, or their fitness to be harnessed with the special harness necessary for drawing the guns and ammunition waggons." (Cond. 6) ". . . Had the defender himself been present, or had he instructed any responsible commissioned officer to attend the yard, he would have seen that it was both improper and dangerous to have permitted the said horses to enter the public streets. But the sergeant to whom the defender entrusted the whole control, and who was instructed by the defender to bring the ammunition waggons to St Andrew Square for the purposes of the 'march-out,' appointed two inexperienced gunners to drive the said horses. The said gunners were not competent drivers, and had no experience in horses. . . . Since the closing of the record the pursuer has ascertained, and it is the fact, that the ammunition waggons so used were those of the 12-pounder gun, and the said gunners were instructed by the defender, Colonel Mackay, or those acting with his authority, to lead the horses through the streets in the manner appropriate to the much heavier waggons of the 4·7 gun. This was contrary to the military regulations, which require 12-pounder ammunition waggons to be driven by drivers seated on horseback, and was dangerous, as a driver leading the horses drawing such a waggon in the manner described has not sufficient control of his horses to enable them to be driven through the streets with due regard to the safety of the public." (Cond. 7) "The said accident was thus caused through the fault of the defenders in permitting said ammunition waggons to be drawn through the public streets by young and restive horses unused to such work and in unaccustomed harness, and driven by incompetent drivers. The accident was further caused by the fault of the defender, Colonel Mackay, in failing to appoint a commissioned officer of experience, delegated with authority to countermand the order which had been given to parade the said ammunition waggons if the horses proved unsuitable and restive."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's daughter having been killed through the fault of the defenders, they are liable in reparation.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is excluded by the Act 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61, sec. 1, and the defenders are entitled to expenses as between agent and client. (2) The action is incompetent—(a) As laid against the said corps and the said James Francis Mackay, as commanding officer, for himself and as representing the said corps; (b) because an action for damages does not lie against the defenders, or all or any of them, as servants of the Crown, in the execution of their duties as such.

On 2d November 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the action as laid against the defenders, the 1st Edinburgh City Royal Garrison Artillery Volunteers, and James Francis Mackay, as Lieutenant-Colonel of said Regiment and Officer Commanding and representing the same, cannot be sustained; therefore dismisses the same, and decerns: Quoad ultra finds that the claim for damages may be pursued against the said James Francis Mackay as an individual: Before answer, allows to the parties a proof of their averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation; reserving expressly in the circumstances the applicability of the Statute 56 and 57 Victoria, caput 61. . . ."*†

* The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 1, enacts,—"Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect:—

"(a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof."

† "OPINION.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that the action cannot be sustained as against Colonel Mackay, as representing the Volunteer Regiment, and as holder and administrator of its funds. These funds belong to the Government—that is to say, the Crown—and it is, I think, an accepted doctrine that the Crown cannot be liable or sued for damages in respect of the 'Torts'—the wrongful act of its officers. I therefore propose to dismiss the action so far as directed against Colonel Mackay as representing the regiment.

"On the other hand, I have come to the conclusion—(1) That the action is sufficiently well laid as against Colonel Mackay as an individual; and (2) that, although he is sued in both capacities, the failure of the action as against him in the one capacity—or, if it is preferred to put it, the failure of the action as against the regiment, or as against the Crown—does not prevent the conclusion for damages—a conclusion which relates to a single wrong—being pursued as against Colonel Mackay individually.

"I also consider, having regard to the pursuer's averments, particularly his averment in the last paragraph of condescendence 1, and the additional statement now introduced at the close of condescendence 6, that I cannot

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The action was excluded by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, sec. 1.[1] The averments made against Colonel Mackay were all based upon his alleged neglect of duty as a volunteer officer. (2) The action conjoined several defenders, against whom different grounds of action were alleged, and was therefore incompetent.[2] The result of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor might be to make Colonel Mackay liable for the whole sum claimed instead of for his pro rata share.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The action was competent against Colonel Mackay as an individual. The fault averred against him was neglect of duty in his private capacity, and not as a volunteer officer. He could not, therefore, claim the protection of the statute.[3] (2) Barr[2] and Sinclair[2] were not in point. In these cases different grounds of action were averred, here there was only one ground of action. In Milne v. Smith,[4] an action had been dismissed as against one of the defenders, and allowed to proceed against the other defender.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The important question which we have to decide here is whether the case stated on record does or does not fall within the restrictions imposed by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61). The 1st section of that Act provides—(His Lordship quoted the section).

In reading this Act it is necessary to note that it applies not only to acts done in pursuance or execution of any public duty or authority, but covers intended execution also. Of course if the person can shew he was not in fault, the action would fail independently of the statute, but here fault is averred, and what we have to decide is whether that fault is covered by the provisions of the statute, in respect that it was committed in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of a public duty or authority.

The Lord Ordinary has found that the action cannot be sustained as against the Volunteers or against Colonel Mackay, as commanding officer and as representing the regiment. So far as the Volunteers and Colonel Mackay were performing military duty, the finding of the Lord Ordinary de plano hold the action excluded by the Statute of 56 and 57 Vict. (Public Authorities Act) founded on by the defenders. I think it is necessary that, before dealing with that question, the exact facts should be ascertained. Accordingly, not being prepared to hold either that the action is excluded by the statute, or that its averments as against Colonel Mackay, as an individual, are plainly irrelevant, I propose to allow a proof before answer, reserving expressly the question as to the applicability of the statute, and also reserving the question of expenses."

gives them the protection of the statute, but he finds that the action may be pursued against Colonel Mackay as an individual. Now, if the record shewed that the Colonel had done something as an individual and not as colonel of the regiment, I could agree with this view. But if on an examination of the record we find that he is not alleged to have done anything as an individual, but only in his military capacity and in the discharge of a public duty or authority, the provisions of the Act will apply. Upon a careful consideration of the record, I am unable to find that the pursuer has well alleged that anything was done by Colonel Mackay except in pursuance of his duty as commanding officer of the corps.

The pursuer, in the first place, alleges that Colonel Mackay is the commanding officer of the corps and as such represents it, but he maintains that in this instance he was acting in an individual capacity. He avers that this was not a parade for military purposes, that attendance at it was not compulsory, and that it was merely a "march-out" for the purpose of attracting recruits to the corps. Colonel Mackay is not alleged to have done anything except in the performance of what he intended and believed to be his duty as the commanding officer of the regiment. It would be strange indeed if it were held that a recruiting sergeant is not performing his duty when he is engaged in the important task of obtaining recruits for the army. And if we are asked to hold that this was a private expedition, not a military parade, we would require some averments as to how private and unofficial persons came to order out the guns and ammunition waggons belonging to a military corps and the men of that corps. On this first point then, I cannot see that the pursuer has made any relevant averments that in what Colonel Mackay did on the occasion in question he was not acting in exercise of his military duty and authority. In cond. 3 we have the averment that Colonel Mackay gave orders for this parade, and I cannot read this as an averment that he gave these orders otherwise than as the officer commanding the corps. In cond. 4 there are averments as to his duty with regard to the horses, the drivers, and the appointment of an experienced officer to superintend. These appear to me as clear a definition of the military duties of a commanding officer as could be wished for. It is also averred that he failed to be present himself, and failed to delegate the superintendence of the horses to a responsible officer, but if there was failure in that respect, it was failure in a military duty, and just such a failure as the Act was intended to prevent from founding an action at law after the expiry of the specified time. There are also averments that the waggons were not in accordance with regulations, but if there was a breach committed it was a breach of military duty. I think, therefore, that we must recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as he finds that the claim may still be pursued against Colonel Mackay as an individual, and that this part of the action should also be dismissed.

Lord Adam.—The question in this case can be shortly stated. It is an action brought by the parent of a child who was killed by two runaway horses against a regiment of volunteers and the person who is the commanding officer of the regiment. The allegations against the defender Mackay are all found summed up in article 4 of the condescendence. It is there averred that the defender neglected his duty in not seeing (1) that quiet horses suitable for the work were used ; (2) that experienced and competent drivers were employed ; and (3) that the harnessing of the horses to the guns and waggons and the parading them on the streets was superintended by a commissioned officer experienced in such work. These are the duties which, it is averred, lay on this defender to see to, and alleged neglect of which forms the ground of action against him. The other averments in the subsequent articles of the condescendence only set forth in detail the particulars of the alleged neglect and the consequences following therefrom.

No. 32.

Wilson v. 1st Edinburgh City Royal Garrison Artillery Volunteers.

What, then, is the meaning of these averments of neglect? Was it neglect of duties lying on this defender in his public capacity as commander of Volunteers or as a private citizen? It is clear that these duties lay not on Mr Mackay as a citizen, but on Lieutenant-Colonel Mackay as commander of the Volunteers. Now, the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, section 1, enacts that where an action is commenced against any person for any act done "in pursuance or execution . . . of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such . . . duty or authority," the action shall not lie unless it is commenced within six months after the act, neglect, or default complained of. In my view, what is here averred is clearly an accident resulting from an alleged neglect on the part of Lieutenant-Colonel Mackay in the execution of his public duty as commander of Volunteers. That is the only question in the case. There is no charge against him of doing anything or neglecting to do anything as an individual. The only charge against him is that of neglect in his capacity of commander of Volunteers.

LORD M'LAREN.—The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor dismisses the action in so far as directed against Colonel Mackay as representing the Volunteer Regiment. His Lordship then goes on to consider the application of the Public Authorities Protection Act in relation to the conclusions against Colonel Mackay as an individual. His Lordship's judgment on that point is that he is unable to deal with the question of the applicability of the Act until the facts are ascertained. With all respect, it would, I think, be a very inefficient protecting Act which left the protection to stand over until the conclusion of a contested case. The Act declares that no such action "shall be instituted" after the lapse of six months. What we have to consider is whether a competent action has been instituted. That we are able to determine now. I am far from saying that a summons might not be so skilfully drawn as to conceal that it was directed against a defender in respect of an act done in execution of a public duty. Then, if it came out at the trial that the action was one in which the defender was entitled to the protection of the Act, the provisions of the Act would be applied, and the action dismissed. But in this case the nature of the action is quite clear on the face of the summons, and therefore the defender is entitled to our judgment now. I agree with your Lordships that it is impossible to read the condescendence without seeing that it is an action for neglect or default in the performance of a military duty. The neglect charged is that Colonel Mackay took his responsibility too easily, and that he did not use all the precautions that were necessary for the protection of the public. It is argued that, in acting as he did, the Colonel was not acting in execution of his duty. But if he did his public work badly, that does not convert his acts into private acts. To say that this was individual negligence, will not exclude the Act. All negligence is in a sense individual, and the argument we reject would exclude altogether the protection given by the Act to persons performing public duties.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and dismissed the action.

The creditors in a bond and assignation in security, granted by a liferentrix by constitution over her liferent interest in certain lands and a mansion-house, brought an action in the Sheriff Court under sec. 5 of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894, for the summary ejection of the liferentrix from the mansion-house, of which she was in personal occupation. Held that the liferentrix was not a "proprietor" in the sense of sec. 5 of the Act, and that therefore the summary remedy of ejection was incompetent.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Perthshire.

MRS MARY MARGARET SMEATON, the widow of Patrick Burgh Smeaton, of Coul, Auchterarder, was the liferentrix of the estate of Coul, including the mansion-house and other offices, conform to disposition by the said deceased Patrick Burgh Smeaton, of Coul, in favour of himself and the said Mrs Mary Margaret Smeaton, in conjunct fee and liferent, and the heirs of their marriage in fee, dated 10th April and recorded 4th October 1872. Elizabeth Margaret Smeaton was the only child of the marriage.

Both Mrs Smeaton and her daughter resided in the mansion-house of Coul.

In March 1891 the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company advanced on loan to Mrs Mary Margaret Smeaton the sum of £1000, and in consideration thereof Mrs Mary Margaret Smeaton, her daughter Elizabeth Margaret Smeaton, and another, by bond and assignation in security, dated 12th March, and recorded 26th March 1891, bound and obliged themselves, jointly and severally, and their respective heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, inter alia, to repay the said sum of £1000 to the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company and their assignees at the term of Whitsunday 1891; and in security and for more sure payment to the pursuers of the whole sums of money, principal, interest, and others therein specified, and generally in security of the several personal obligations and others contained in the said bond and assignation in security, inter alia, made over to and in favour of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, their rights in and to the lands and estate of Coul, including the mansion-house, garden, stables, and offices.

The interest on the loan having fallen into arrear, the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, on 16th February 1903, intimated a formal demand for payment of the principal sum contained in the bond under and in terms of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868.

The loan was not repaid within the statutory period of three months, and on 14th August the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company obtained a decree of rents, maills, and duties of the estate of Coul in the Sheriff Court at Perth.

On 29th April 1904 the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company brought a petition in the Sheriff Court at Perth against Mrs Mary Margaret Smeaton, residing at Coul, and Elizabeth Margaret Smeaton, also residing at Coul, for warrant to summarily eject the defenders from the lands and estate of Coul, and particularly from the mansion-house of Coul, garden, stables, and offices in connection therewith, in terms of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1894.*

The pursuers, after setting forth the facts above narrated, averred that the principal sum in the bond was still unpaid, and pleaded, inter alia;—1. The pursuers being heritable creditors in possession of the estate of Coul, in virtue of the decree of maills and duties in their favour founded on, and the defenders being in personal occupation of the said mansion-house, garden, stables, and offices forming part of the pursuers' security subjects, the pursuers are entitled to decree of ejection in terms of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1894.

The defender Mrs Mary Margaret Smeaton pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) The defender not being proprietor of the subjects in question, ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 10th August 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) granted warrant of ejection against the defender Mrs Mary Margaret Smeaton in terms of the conclusion of the petition; and refused the same as regarded the defender Elizabeth Margaret Smeaton.*

The defender Mrs Mary Margaret Smeaton appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—At common law a petition for summary ejection was not competent against a person in occupation on a good title, and not possessing viciously or precariously.[1] The action was equally incompetent under section 5 of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894.[2] The word "proprietor" in that section meant a person who was in fact proprietor of lands, and not as here a mere liferenter. Sections 6 and 7[2] made this quite clear, because these sections gave to a creditor in possession a right to grant leases for long periods. A liferenter had no such right, and it was impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended to give the creditors of a liferenter, to the prejudice of the fiar, a right which the liferenter did not possess. A liferenter could not grant a disposition of the lands, and all the respondents held was an assignation of the defender's right to the profits of the lands.[3]

Argued for the respondents;—It was admitted that a petition for summary ejection was in this case incompetent at common law, but it was competent under section 5 of the Act of 1894.[2] The appellant had conveyed to the respondents her whole liferent right in the mansion-house and lands of Coul. A right of liferent made real by infeftment was a heritable right,[4] and the word "lands" included all heritable subjects.[5] The appellant was therefore a proprietor of lands in the sense of section 5.[2] Further, by the definition clause of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868,[6] which was incorporated in the Act of 1894,[7] "creditor" included a person in whose favour a conveyance constituting a security over the rents and profits of lands had been granted. The respondents could not make good their right to the rents and profits of the lands unless the appellant was ejected from the mansion-house.

Lord President.—The question in this case is whether the Sheriff-substitute was right in granting a warrant of ejection against the defender. She is the liferentrix of the estate under a disposition granted by her husband in her favour. I do not understand it to be disputed that, unless the provisions of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act apply, the interlocutor cannot be supported. The question therefore is, whether the case does or does not fall under the provisions of section 5 of that Act, which provides— (His Lordship quoted the section). I cannot see any adequate ground for holding that this provision applies to the present case so as to bring the defender into the position of an occupant without a title. Mr M'Clure admitted that if he fails on the construction of the statute, he cannot make good his case, and accordingly, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is erroneous, and that his interlocutor should be recalled.

* "Note.—It is thought that the liferent of Mrs Smeaton could form the subject of a heritable security. She is in possession. Though the word proprietor is used in the fifth section of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894, and this defender is not in the full sense proprietor, but a liferenter (the lands having been conveyed by her husband to him and her in conjunct fee and liferent and to the heirs of the marriage in fee), the Sheriff-substitute considers that the remedy given to the creditor against the debtor in possession is available. . . ."

LORD ADAM.—The defender here is in possession of the mansion-house of Coul, under a liferent right by constitution, which includes both the mansion-house and the lands. The pursuers are an insurance company who are heritable creditors of the defender under a bond and assignation in security. Proceeding on this bond the pursuers have obtained decree of mailla and duties of the estate of Coul, and have entered into possession of the lands, and are drawing the rents of the lands. This lady, the defender, being herself in possession of the house is not affected by this decree, and the pursuers in order to get possession have had recourse to this summary remedy.

Mr M'Clure quite properly admits that, treated as an ordinary common law case of ejection, the action would be incompetent, in respect the occupier is not in the position of a person occupying without a title. But then he said the power of summarily ejecting the defender in this way is to be found in section 5 of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894. That raises a question of the construction of section 5, viz., whether it applies to a person in the position of the present defender.

I agree with your Lordship that section 5 applies to a person who is in fact proprietor of lands, and cannot be extended to a person, like Mrs Smeaton, who is not a proprietrix, but a mere liferentrix. If one refers to section 6 of the Act, we find that if Mr M'Clure's argument is right, the creditor on getting possession of the lands would be in a position to let the lands on lease for seven years. I should be very unwilling to put such an interpretation on section 5 as would involve giving the creditors of a liferentrix a power of management of the estate greater than that possessed by the liferentrix herself. The liferentrix does not have such a power to grant leases, and it would be very startling to find given to her assignee a power not possessed by her. In the Act stringent powers are given, which are all very well when the owners of the land are themselves in possession, but are not applicable to the case of a mere liferentrix. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the word "proprietor" in section 5 is not to be extended to include liferenters, who are not proprietors.

LORD M'LAREN.—The facts of this case are simple. The liferentrix of an estate granted in security to an insurance company an assignation of her liferent interest in the estate of Coul, including the mansion-house. The debt not having been paid on demand, the Insurance Company obtained decree of mailla and duties, and now bring this action to obtain possession of the mansion-house and curtilage, which are in the natural possession of the liferentrix. They found on sec. 5 of the Heritable Securities Act, 1894.

That section is intended to apply to the case of a proprietor who is in the natural possession of the security subjects, so that the holder of the security may be able to dispossess him by summary process.

The question is whether this section extends to a liferenter in possession, or whether it is confined to the case of a proprietor in fee. In order that a creditor should have the benefit of this section, he must shew that he comes within the language of the section—i.e., that he is in the position of a mortgagee of "lands disponed in security."

I was inclined at an early stage of the argument to the view that while a liferent may be in certain respects not heritable and not specifically transmissible, yet as it may be the subject of a real security and may be attached by real diligence, the section would apply. On further consideration I now think that such an extended construction of the statute is not maintainable. No doubt the liferent is a real security, but it is not capable of being transferred so as to give the transferee a feudal right. As Mr Erskine points out,[1] there cannot properly be an assignation of the heritable liferent estate. An assignation carries nothing more than the life interest, which is a different thing from the transfer of the liferent estate. The heritable estate is not transferred. One reason suggested from the bar is that the liferenter has no power to give an entry or warrant for infeftment. Another difficulty is that our law does not recognise the giving seisin for another man's life. The notary could only give liferent sasine to the Insurance Company, which would have no meaning.

This general argument is confirmed by sec. 6 of the Act which provides —(His Lordship quoted the section). Now, it is plain that a liferentrix could not grant a lease for seven years, but only for so long as her liferent subsisted. We are not to assume that it was intended that the assignee of a liferenter should exercise larger powers than the liferenter himself could have exercised.

I agree then that this summary process of ejection cannot be maintained. Whether there is any other process independent of statute by which the heritable creditor can get possession may be a question of considerable moment, but it is not before us.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. This is a process by which it is proposed to turn the defender out of the house she occupies by summary ejectment. That is a severe remedy, and we must see that it is carried out in rigorous conformity with the legal conditions upon which alone it can be employed.

It is conceded by the creditors that the process cannot be supported unless it falls under the provisions of section 5 of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1894, and therefore the whole question is whether that section applies to the creditors of a liferenter in possession. I think with your Lordships that it does not. The section begins with the words "when a creditor desires to enter into possession of the lands disponed in security," and it therefore assumes that the creditor has obtained a disposition of the lands from the proprietor, and nobody who is not in that position is enabled to take the summary proceedings afterwards authorised.

Dec. 1, 1904.
Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Smeaton.

The enactment goes on to say that the proprietor from whom the creditor's right is derived may be treated as an occupant without a title. The creditors in the present case are not in the position assumed by that enactment. They hold no disposition of the lands in security, but only an assignation in security of the fruits and profits of the lands during the subsistence of a liferent right. And this was all that the liferenter could give. The power of the liferenter to confer right on a transferee is quite clearly defined by Mr Erskine,[1] who points out that the liferenter cannot give a disposition of the lands, but merely an assignation of the fruits. That alone is sufficient to exclude the interpretation maintained by the respondents. But when the 5th section is read along with sections 6 and 7 the matter becomes even more clear. The powers conferred on a creditor necessarily assume that he is to be put in the place of a proprietor in fee. By section 6 a creditor in possession may grant a lease not exceeding seven years, and by section 7 he may grant a lease for a longer period, not exceeding twenty-one years, provided he gets the sanction of the Sheriff. It is impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended to give the creditors of a liferenter a right which the liferenter himself does not possess, and that to the prejudice of the undoubted rights of the fiar, who has nothing whatever to do with the creditors of the liferenter or their securities. For these reasons I think that the 5th section must be construed as your Lordship proposes.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and dismissed the action.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Judicial Factor.—The curator bonis of a lunatic expended the whole moveable estate of the ward on her maintenance, and thereafter, on the advice of the Accountant of Court, and by the authority of the Sheriff, sold the ward's heritable property, the income of which was not sufficient to maintain her. Held that the balance of the ward's estate remaining at her death was moveable quoad succession, on the ground that in order to maintain the ward it was necessary for the curator to sell her heritable estate.

1ST DIVISION.

MRS MARY SOUTER OR M'ADAM, widow of Alexander M'Adam, inspector of works, Aberdeen, was committed to the Royal Lunatic Asylum, Aberdeen, as a person of unsound mind in August 1896. On 12th September 1896 Alexander Simpson, accountant in the Aberdeen Savings Bank, was appointed her curator bonis by the Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

At the date of the appointment of the curator bonis Mrs M'Adam's estate consisted solely of certain house property in Aberdeen, of which the net rental was £19 per annum. Under her husband's will Mrs M'Adam was entitled to the free income of his estate, amounting to £7 per annum. The cost of boarding Mrs M'Adam in the asylum was £30 per annum, exclusive of clothing.

[1] Ersk. ii. 9, 41.

No. 34.

Dec. 2, 1904. M'Adam's Executor v. Souters.

In November 1896 the curator bonis, on the advice of the Accountant of Court, claimed Mrs M'Adam's legal rights in her husband's estate, and having obtained payment of £109, 16s. 1d. from her husband's trustees, proceeded to expend that sum on her maintenance.

On 24th February 1901 the curator bonis reported to the Accountant of Court that the whole of his ward's moveable estate, being the fund derived from her husband's trustees, was practically exhausted, having been expended for her maintenance and the expenses of the curatory, and that it would be necessary to sell the ward's heritable property in order to obtain a fund for her maintenance, the income derived from the rental of her heritable property being insufficient for that purpose.

The Accountant of Court, after consideration of the circumstances, was of opinion that it had become necessary either to borrow on the security of the property or to sell the same, and advised that the property should be sold.

On 14th March 1901 the curator bonis was authorised to sell the property by the Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

Thereafter the curator bonis sold the property for the sum of £576, and continued to aliment the ward out of the proceeds until her death.

The sum of £400, being part of the proceeds of the sale, was immediately after the sale invested upon a heritable bond. The remainder was deposited in bank.

Mrs M'Adam remained permanently insane until her death upon 9th September 1903. She died intestate, and was survived by two brothers and the children of deceased brothers and sisters.

At the date of Mrs M'Adam's death the balance of funds remaining in the hands of her curator amounted to £452, 4s. 1d., consisting of the above-mentioned heritable bond and £52, 4s. 1d. in bank.

Questions having arisen as to whether Mrs M'Adam's estate was to be treated as heritable or moveable, a special case was presented to the Court, in which the foregoing facts were set forth. It was not stated that the curator could have borrowed money on the property.

The first party was Alexander Souter, Mrs M'Adam's executor-dative; the second party was the said Alexander Souter, as her heir-at-law; the third parties were William Souter and others, her whole next of kin and representatives in mobilibus.

The questions of law were:—"(1) Was the estate left by the deceased Mrs Mary Souter or M'Adam heritable quoad succession at the date of her death? Or (2) Was the said estate moveable quoad succession, and does it fall to be divided among the parties of the third part? Or (3) Was the estate partly heritable and partly moveable quoad succession, and, if so, in what proportions?"

Argued for the first and third parties;—The estate was moveable quoad succession. The sale was necessary, and the ward could not have been maintained otherwise. The conversion which had actually taken place must therefore rule the question of succession.[1] It would have been different if the sale had been a mere act of wise administration on the part of the curator.[2]

Argued for the second party;—A curator was not entitled to alter

the succession to his ward's estate.[1] The sale was a mere act of administration, and was not necessary though it might have been beneficial, because the curator might have borrowed on the security of the property. "Necessary" meant "legally necessary."[2] The price was therefore a surrogatum for the property.[3]

LORD ADAM.—(After narrating the facts)—The question is whether this estate left by the deceased is heritable or moveable quoad succession. Now, at the date of the ward's death the estate was, in the first instance, to be treated as moveable property, but that presumption may be displaced by shewing that the money was the result of the conversion of the heritable estate in circumstances insufficient to alter its character quoad succession. It may not be enough to shew that it was an act of wise administration. The duty of a curator bonis is to preserve intact so far as may be the estate of the ward. His duty is to do his best in the interest of his ward. It is no function of his to change the character of the estate from heritable to moveable, even though the Accountant of Court and Sheriff thought the realisation of the heritage a necessary act. That alone would not be enough. But then the facts here shew that the change was inevitable. This woman had to be maintained, and for that purpose it was necessary that money should be got, and it could be got in no other way than by the sale of the heritage. The facts are, in my opinion, sufficient to shew that this change was necessary, and, accordingly, I think the estate falls to be dealt with as moveable estate.

LORD M'LAREN.—The questions that arise out of acts of administration by a legal guardian, such as a factor loco tutoris or curator bonis, are not the same as we are familiar with in connection with trust administration. There is this notable distinction, that a trustee sells on his own responsibility, while a judicial officer can in general only do so with the authority of the Court of Session upon the report of the Accountant of Court. Now, I agree with Lord Adam that the primary duty of a curator bonis is to preserve the estate in the same form and condition in which it comes into his hands for the benefit of the ward. The ward may recover, if it is a case of mental incapacity, or attain majority in the case of a pupil, and will then come into the possession of his estate, and it ought to be preserved unaltered for his use in that event. Out of this duty of preservation there has been developed the principle that the curator cannot by any act of administration alter the succession to the estate. Now, there are two rules which are applicable to the consideration of such a question, one is that the succession cannot be affected by any act of ordinary administration, but only by an act done of necessity, and to that, as far as I know, there is no exception. But there is this further rule, that everything must be presumed in favour of honest administration. Here the curator had represented to the Court that this sale was an act of necessity, and therefore the onus is on the other party to convince us to the contrary. I can find nothing set forth in this case to convince me that the curator was wrong in the view that he had taken as to the necessity of a sale, and I can well understand that, in view of the expense and difficulty of borrowing on the security of a small heritable property, the curator may have had no choice but to have recourse to a sale. If it was practically necessary, that is sufficient for the decision of the case, because the estate has been turned into money for the benefit of the ward, and conversion has taken place in fact and in law.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think the rule of law in this case is clear. The rule is that succession must be regulated by the condition of the property at the death of the deceased, and in the present case the property left by the ward consisted of money and not of land. But it is said that it must still be treated as heritage, because the curator had no power to convert land into money except in case of necessity, and there was no legal necessity in the present case. I confess I do not understand the distinction between what is called legal, and practical, necessity. But then a sale may be necessary for one purpose and not for another; and the question in the particular case must be whether the purpose for which a curator thought it necessary to sell is one which the law recognises as a sufficient justification for converting land into money. Now, in the present case the necessity was to provide for the maintenance of the ward, because she could not be maintained without money; and the curator accordingly applied for and obtained the sanction of the Court to sell heritage. It is said that the curator could have borrowed money on the property, but it is not so stated in the case, and we must take the case as containing a correct and exhaustive statement of all the facts which the parties have agreed are to form the basis of the judgment, and I am afraid therefore that any statement of fact which is not made in the case must be assumed to be either irrelevant or inaccurate. I therefore agree that the property in question must be treated as moveable.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Fife and Kinross.

ON 10th August 1904 John Hamilton, farmer, Grange Farm, West Calder, took out a summons under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline, against Mrs Ann Thomson or Kerr, and George Kerr, dairyman, Park House Dairy, Crossgates, her husband, concluding for decree for £29, 16s. as per account produced.

On 11th August the defenders were cited to appear at a Court to be held on 16th August, by service of a copy of the summons, with a citation thereto annexed, and a copy of the account sued for.

The defenders appeared on 16th August, and stated, inter alia, the following plea (as noted by the Sheriff-substitute in the minutes of procedure):—"1. Under the provisions of section 3 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, incorporated by section 5 of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, the summons is a sufficient warrant for citing the defenders to appear and answer at the time and place mentioned in the summons, 'not being sooner than the sixth day after such citation.' The citations given to the defenders were served by the officer on 11th August 1904, taken away again by him on same day, and re-served on 12th August 1904. Neither service complies with the statutory enactment as to the inducie of citation. The summons, not being a warrant for the citations given to the defenders to appear at a Court to be held on 16th August 1904, should be dismissed, with expenses to the defenders."

The Sheriff-substitute (Shennan) appointed the cause to be tried on 13th September.

On 13th September the Sheriff-substitute granted decree for the sum sued for, the formal decree being in the following terms:—

"At Dunfermline, the 13th day of September 1904,—The Sheriff of Fife and Kinross finds the within-designed Mrs Ann Thomson or Kerr and George Kerr, defenders, jointly and severally, liable to the pursuer in the sum of £29, 16s., with £3, 15s. 8d. of expenses.

"JAS. S. MUIR, Sheriff-Clerk Depute."

Neither party requested the Sheriff to take any note of the evidence, and no such note was taken.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Mackenzie), who on 5th October 1904 pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Sheriff having heard parties' procurators, and considered the cause, refuses the appeal, and adheres to the judgment appealed against."

The defenders appealed.*

At the hearing the pursuer admitted that the citation was bad for want of the proper inducice.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The citation being admittedly bad, the defenders were not barred from taking the objection by sec. 12, subsec. (2), of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876. Sec. 2 of that Act enacted that, unless where otherwise expressly provided, the Act should apply only to civil proceedings in "the ordinary Sheriff Court." There certainly was no express provision applying sec. 12, subsec. (2), to proceedings in the Debts Recovery Court, and consequently the question was as to whether actions in the Debts Recovery Court were actions in the "ordinary Sheriff Court." They were not. That was shewn by sec. 8 of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, which made provision for the remit of Debts Recovery Act cases to the Sheriff's ordinary roll in the same manner as Small-Debt Court cases might be remitted under the Small-Debt Act, 1837, to the Sheriff's ordinary roll, the Debts Recovery Court and the Small-Debt Court being thus put in pari casu as Courts distinct from the ordinary Sheriff Court. Then the whole forms of the ordinary Court differed from those of the Debts Recovery Court. In particular, sec. 6 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, required all actions in "the ordinary Sheriff Court" to be commenced by petition, whereas the initial writ in the Debts Recovery Court was a summons, and subsec. (2) of sec. 12 of the Act of 1876 in terms applied only to objections to the regularity of the service of "petitions." The Small-Debt Amendment Act, 1889, sec. 5, expressly made sec. 12 of the Act of 1876 applicable to Small-Debt Court cases, the word "summons" being directed to be read for the word "petition"; but there was no corresponding enactment with reference to the Debts Recovery Court. The dicta in Fraser v. Mackintosh,[1] referred to by the pursuer, came to no more than this, that the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, did not extend the orbit of the Sheriff's jurisdiction, but merely enabled him to exercise his ordinary jurisdiction in a summary form—that was to say, not in the forms and according to the rules of the ordinary Sheriff Court, but according to the forms and the rules of the Debts Recovery Court as laid down in the Debts Recovery Act of 1867—and the question here was one of form. The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), enacts:—

Sec. 2. " . . . Unless where otherwise expressly provided, this Act shall only apply to civil proceedings in the ordinary Sheriff Court."

Sec. 6. "Every action in the ordinary Sheriff Court shall be commenced by a petition in one of the forms, as nearly as may be, contained in Schedule (A) annexed to this Act . . ."

The Small-Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 26), enacts:—

Sec. 5. "The provisions contained in," inter alia, sec. 12 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1876, "shall apply to all causes in the Small-Debt Court competent under this or the before recited Acts, the word 'summons' being read for 'petition,' and the word 'appear' for the words 'enter appearance,' wherever they occur in the said sections" of the Act of 1876.

tain both findings in fact and findings in law, but where no notes of the evidence had been required to be taken, the findings in fact were to be final. An interlocutor in the form here pronounced practically made it impossible to review the judgment on the merits even on questions of law, which under sec. 10 it was plainly the appellants' right to have brought under review.

The argument for the pursuer on the first point sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.[1] He was not called upon to argue the second point.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two points raised in this case. The first arises on an objection taken by the appellants to the regularity of the citation. Now, whether that objection is one which could be stated and considered in the present case depends upon whether the Court of the Sheriff when sitting under the Debts Recovery Act of 1867 is or is not a Court of his ordinary jurisdiction, and whether the rules which govern the latter apply. I have no doubt myself that they do, and I agree with the late Lord President Inglis' opinion in the case of Fraser v. Mackintosh,[1] where he says "that in disposing of a case brought before him under the recent Debts Recovery Act, the Sheriff does not, properly speaking, exercise any new jurisdiction. What he does is to exercise his ordinary jurisdiction in the summary manner provided by that Act." I am therefore of opinion that section 12, subsection 2, of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876 applies here, viz., that a party who appears shall not be permitted to state any objection to the regularity of the execution or service as against himself of the petition by which he is convened.

The second point taken by the appellants is that the proceedings were irregular because the Sheriff made no findings in fact or in law. There appears to be a considerable amount of confusion in the provisions of sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Act of 1867, but it is clear that the Sheriff is not to take a note of the evidence unless asked by either party to do so, and that it is in that case only that he is to make findings in fact and law. In the case where no record of the evidence is taken I can find no provision requiring him to make any findings, although of course there is nothing to prevent him doing so if he thinks fit. I am therefore of opinion that the appellants have failed upon both points.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The Debts Recovery Act makes provision for the trial of actions in the Sheriff Court in a more summary fashion than is required by ordinary Sheriff Court procedure. The Sheriff if he thinks fit can remit to his ordinary roll any case which he thinks ought not to be tried in so summary a fashion, but that does not appear to me to imply that the Debts Recovery Act created a separate jurisdiction from the Sheriff's ordinary jurisdiction. I know of no civil jurisdiction which the Sheriff has except his ordinary jurisdiction and his small-debt jurisdiction. I am therefore of opinion that section 12, subsection (2), of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, applies to the case of a party who appears in a case under the Debts

[1] Fraser v. Mackintosh, 6 Macph. 170.

Recovery Act, and prevents him from objecting to the regularity of the execution or service against himself. No. 35.

Dec. 3, 1904. Hamilton v. Kerr.

On the second point it appears clear enough that the Sheriff-substitute was under no obligation to take notes of the evidence, and no notes having been taken the form of interlocutor which he has adopted is correct, being that prescribed by section 8 of the Act.

LORD MONCREIFF.—On the second point raised by the appellants—the form of the Sheriff's interlocutor—I agree with both your Lordships. There is some confusion between the terms of sections 9 and 10 of the Act of 1867, and the reference in section 10 to "findings in fact" is scarcely consistent with the provision in section 9 that it shall not be necessary for the Sheriff to take any note of the evidence or of the facts admitted unless required to do so by either party. But I am of opinion that when no note of evidence has been taken, the interlocutor is not incompetent merely because it contains no findings in fact.

On the other point—the competency of stating an objection to the citation after appearance has been entered—I have had some doubts. The question depends upon whether or not section 12 (2) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, applies to an action raised under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, and that in turn upon whether or not such an action is "a civil proceeding in the ordinary Sheriff Court." By section 8 of the Act of 1867 the Sheriff has the power of remitting to his ordinary roll an action brought under the Debts Recovery Act, and in such a case I cannot doubt that the procedure would in all respects be ruled by the provisions of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876. Further, section 12 of the Act of 1876 is by section 5 of the Small-Debt Act, 1889, made applicable to causes in the Small-Debt Court, and it would be anomalous that the intermediate Court should be in a different position. It may be that no corresponding provision was made in the case of the Debts Recovery Court, because in regard to such matters it was regarded as forming part of the ordinary Sheriff Court. Accordingly, although I do not consider the question as free from doubt, I am not prepared to differ from your Lordships on this point.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Fife and Kinross.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,* between Mrs Margaret Wright or Anderson, claiming compensation for the death of her son, John Anderson, engine-driver, and the Lochgelly Iron and Coal Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute at Dunfermline (Shennan) refused compensation, and at the request of Mrs Anderson, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth the following facts as admitted or proved:—

"1. That the pursuer is the mother of John Anderson, who met with his death through injuries sustained by him on 11th November 1903, by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents, the deceased being a 'workman' and the respondents the 'undertakers' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. . . .

"4. That the respondents are owners or occupiers of two pits situated at Lochgelly, known as the Melgund and the Jenny Gray Pits. These are connected by a line of railway with the North British Railway system. The total length of this line from the Melgund Pit (the more distant) to its junction with the North British Railway is about a mile and a quarter. The Jenny Gray Pit is nearly a quarter of a mile from the Melgund Pit. This line of railway takes the following course—from the Melgund Pit it runs past the Jenny Gray Pit to a drum-house situated about 800 yards from the Jenny Gray Pit, crossing on its way a public road by a level crossing. Over that portion of its course the line is sufficiently level to be worked by a locomotive. From a point near the drum-house the line for about 340 yards runs down a steep incline (of about 1 in 9) known as a wheelbrae, and over that portion the haulage is worked by a wire rope (passed round a regulating drum in the drum-house), of which one end is attached to the full waggons at the top of the incline, and the other to the empty waggons at the foot. Near the foot of this wheelbrae the line joins the North British Railway system. At the Melgund Pit and the Jenny Gray Pit there are the usual colliery sidings, and there are also sidings at the drum-house and alongside the North British Railway line at the foot of the wheelbrae. The line of railway above described is of the usual gauge, and ordinary railway waggons are used on it.

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), enacts, sec. 7, subsec. (1)—"This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers . . . on, or in, or about," inter alia, "a mine." By sec. 7 (2) it is declared that "mine means a mine to which the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, . . . applies." By sec. 75 of that Act it is declared that "mine" includes "all the shafts, levels, planks, works, tramways, and sidings, both below ground and above ground, in and adjacent to and belonging to the mine."

No. 36.

Dec. 6, 1904. Anderson v. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co., Limited.

"5. That at the time of the accident the deceased was employed by the respondents as an engine-driver, in conveying waggons between the Melgund and the Jenny Gray Pits and the drum-house. It was part of his duty, when the brae was being run, to leave his engine at the back of the drum-house, and go forward towards the top of the wheelbrae, in order to sprag the empty waggons when they came up, and, in doing so, he usually walked through under the drum-house by the side of the line. On 11th November 1903 the deceased, when proceeding to his duty, was caught by the wire rope, as it suddenly became taut with a jerk on the waggons being allowed to start, and was tossed in the air, receiving injuries, of which he died on 13th November. The place where the accident occurred was about 800 yards from the Jenny Gray Pit, the nearer of the two.

"6. That the line of railway connecting these two pits with the North British Railway system and the various sidings in connection therewith are the property of the respondents, and are used by them in connection with the working of these pits."

On these facts the Sheriff found "that the said accident arose out of and in the course of deceased's employment, but that said accident did not happen on, in, or about a mine in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897."

The following questions of law were stated:—

"1. Whether, on the facts stated, the place where the accident occurred formed part of a mine within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?

"2. Whether, in the circumstances stated, the said accident occurred on, in, or about a mine within the meaning of the said statute?"

Argued for the appellant;—Any part of a private line was a siding, from the point where it left the mine until it reached the main line.[1] If so, an accident happening on any part of the private line happened in the mine, under the definition of "mine" in the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. That definition was not brought under the notice of the Court in Caton v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Coal Company,[2] and the decision there proceeded on the ground that the accident did not arise out of or in the course of the workman's employment. Even if the bare siding could not cover the whole private line, it was found, in fact, that there were sidings at the drum-house where the accident occurred. These were adjacent to the mine, and the workman was "on, or in, or about" them when he was killed.

Argued for the respondents;—The place where the accident occurred was not a siding. A private line and a siding were quite distinguishable, though for certain purposes they might be classed together. Even if a private line was to be considered as a siding, the place where the accident occurred was not a siding adjacent to the mine.[3] Even assuming that a private line from a mine to the main line was a siding, and that part of it was adjacent to the mine (as it must necessarily be) it did not follow that the whole line was adjacent to the mine. It was a question of degree, and in the present case the fact that the accident occurred 800 yards from the mine took it out of the statute.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—I shall express my opinion in this case in a very few words. I do not need to read what is stated in the case; the statement of facts is before your Lordship. The Sheriff says:—"On these grounds" which he states, "I found that the said accident arose out of and in the course of deceased's employment, but that said accident did not happen 'in, on, or about a mine,' in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897." Now, I state my opinion in these few words, that upon the facts stated in the case I am of opinion that the accident did arise "in, on, or about a mine"—that is to say, the mine of which the company here were the undertakers—and in the course of the deceased's employment connected with the mine.

LORD TRAYNER.—From the description given of it, by the Sheriff-substitute, I entertain no doubt that the railway on which the deceased met with the accident which caused his death is a siding belonging to the respondents, connected with, and used by the respondents in connection with, their mines. The definition of "mine" given in the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (which is also the definition of "mine" under the Workmen's Compensation Act), includes as part of the mine any siding "adjacent to and belonging to the mine." That definition covers the railway siding in question, and as the deceased was fatally injured on the siding, he was so injured on or in the mine. I therefore think the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was wrong, and am prepared to answer both of the questions put to us in the affirmative.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I have come to the conclusion that the Sheriff is wrong. The question is, whether the place where the accident occurred was in, on, or about a "mine" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. It was not in, on, or about a "railway" within the definition of the word "railway" given in section 7 (2) of the Act; and therefore to bring the case within the Workmen's Compensation Act, it must be shewn that the accident occurred "on, or in, or about a mine," to which the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1887 applies. We are thus sent to the 75th section of that statute for the definition of a "mine" to which the Act applies, and we find that the word "mine" includes, inter alia, "tramways and sidings, both below ground and above ground, in and adjacent to and belonging to the mine." Therefore, if an accident occurs "about" a siding which is adjacent and belongs to a mine, the person injured, provided he was injured in the course of his employment, will be entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The question in the present case is one of some delicacy; but on considering the facts found by the Sheriff, I am disposed to think that, giving a liberal but fair interpretation, the appellant's son was injured in the course of his employment "about a mine" in the sense of the statute. The distance between the Jenny Gray pit, and the North British Railway system is in all a mile; but on account of a steep incline, loaded trucks cannot be drawn by an engine beyond the drum-house, situated less than half a mile from the Jenny Gray pit. It is found as a fact in the case, that at the Jenny Gray pit there are the usual colliery sidings, and that there are also sidings at the drum-house 800 yards away from the pit, and probably not so far distant from the sidings at the pit.

The next point is that the appellant's son, when he received his injuries, was not upon his engine, which could proceed no farther; he left his engine at the back of the drum-house, and went forward towards the top of the brae for the purpose of spragging the empty waggons when they came up, I suppose, into the sidings connected with the drum-house. There is no doubt that he was injured in the immediate vicinity of those sidings, and if those sidings can be regarded as adjacent to the Jenny Gray pit, the appellant is entitled to succeed.

I am disposed to hold that the sidings at the drum-house were really part of the equipment of the pit, and adjacent to it in the sense of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. The present case is somewhat stronger than the case of Monaghan v. United Collieries, Limited,[1] decided by the First Division, because in that case the accident occurred, not upon the branch line, but upon the Caledonian Railway with which it was connected. In deciding that case, the First Division had before them the case of Turnbull v. The Lambton Collieries, Limited.[2] The opinions in the latter case are very shortly given, but they seemed to have turned upon this, that the private line connecting the collieries with the North-Eastern Railway was twelve miles in length, and the Court of Appeal seem to have held that when the accident occurred the operations which were going on were those of transit, and not sufficiently connected with the work of the mine to make the locus adjacent to and belonging to the mine as distinguished from belonging to the mine-owner.

On the whole matter, I am for answering the questions put to us in the affirmative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I cannot regret the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived from one point of view, because it results in this widow receiving compensation for what was a very sad loss to her, but I regret that I am unable to concur in the judgment which is proposed, holding, as I do, that the decision of the Sheriff-substitute was right. This accident happened on a railroad constructed by the respondents' company to enable them to convey coals and materials from or to the North British Railway, with which their private line was joined up. At a place on that private railroad, 800 yards from the mine, there was a steep gradient which necessitated the use of a rope working on a drum, so that the weight of the loaded waggons descending the incline could be used to haul up the empty waggons from the bottom. It was, therefore, necessary to have a double line or loop at this place that the outgoing and returning waggons might pass one another on the incline. The injured man was an engine-driver, and in the course of his duty hauled the waggons to and from the incline, and he met with his accident, which caused his death, when spragging empty waggons which had been brought up by the rope to the top of the incline.

The question is whether this accident happened "on, in, or about the mine." I am of opinion with the Sheriff-substitute that it did not. The place at which the accident happened was 800 yards from the mine, and the work that was being done was being carried out, not at a siding at the mine, but on a road made for conveyance of material away from, or towards the mine. Had it occurred at the sidings at the mine itself—those sidings which were required there for loading waggons and making up trains—I should have held that it happened about the mine, but at the place where it did happen, I hold that it was as little "about" the mine as would have been the case had there been no railroad, and the work of transit from the mine had been done by horse haulage on a private road made for conveying the products of the work from the mine to some other place. My view is that, unless it can be held that every private railway made from a mine to a public railway is a siding, however long it may be, because it is coupled up to the public line, and that it is, therefore, a siding in the sense of the statute throughout its whole length, the railroad in this case cannot be held to be a siding to which the Act applies. I am not prepared to hold this entire line to be a siding. My opinion is that this was, at the place where the accident happened a road leading away from the sidings about the pit, and not itself a siding about the pit. It was not, in my opinion, "a siding" "adjacent to and belonging to the mine." If I were able to see that the decision in the case of Monaghan v. The United Collieries Company[1] ruled this case, I should have no hesitation in following it. I think the decision there may have been quite right. In that case only 80 yards of distance intervened between the pit and the public line of the Caledonian Railway. There was, in fact, no road there for conveyance to a distance, as distinguished from a short siding at the very pit itself, to hold the waggons clear of the railway line while being loaded and kept standing ready to be passed on to the public line. That is, in my opinion, a very different case from the present, where the place of the accident was nearly half a mile away from the pit, the waggons being at a place nearly half way on a journey of more than a mile between the main line of railway and the mine.

In the case of Caton v. The Summerlee and Mossend Coal Company,[2] I expressed the opinion that an accident, happening in a place on a private railway 230 yards away from the mine could not be held to have happened on, in, or about the mine, and it appears to me that, as regards the place of the accident in the present case, still less is there ground for holding that expression to apply to it. The case of Turnbull v. The Lambton Collieries[3] in the English Court, which was quoted at the debate, appears very much to resemble the present. There the injured man was driving waggons with coal along a private line, and was injured by his head striking a waggon on the coal company's private line near the end of the line furthest from the pit. It was held that the case was clearly not one to which "on, in, or about" could apply, and that the word "adjacent" in the Act of 1887 meant physically adjacent. It is true that in that case the private line was some miles long, but the accident happened about three quarters of a mile from the pit, and I am unable to see—if the principle of that decision was right, as I hold it to have been—that a place 800 yards distant can be held to be "adjacent." It would be difficult, indeed impossible, to draw a line between "adjacent" and "non-adjacent," unless it be taken at the place where the sidings at the pit end, and the road for transit from the pit must be reasonably held to begin, the traffic having left the pit and being on its journey to another place.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), Schedule I. sec. 11—Review of Weekly Payments—Certificate of medical practitioner appointed under the Act.—A mason's labourer, sixty-six years of age, whose left eye had been injured in the course of his employment, was awarded under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the maximum weekly payment for total incapacity.

Prior to an application by the employers to have the payment diminished, the workman was examined by one of the medical men appointed by the Secretary of State. The medical certificate bore that the workman's right eye was healthy, and the vision good, but that the left eye was seriously defective. "His disability is, however, at present great enough to unfit him for his usual occupation of a mason's labourer, though I am of opinion he is quite fit for any work where he would not have to exercise for the safety of life or limb that nice discrimination as to distances for which the sight of two eyes is necessary." Neither party moved for proof.

The Sheriff held (1) that the certificate was conclusive as to the workman's condition, and that other evidence as to the workman's present earning capacity was incompetent; and (2) that the certificate did not show that the workman's earning capacity had increased to such an extent as to justify a reduction of the weekly payment.

In an appeal, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the certificate of the medical practitioner under section 11 was conclusive evidence of the workman's condition; and (2) that as the certificate bore that the workman was unfit for his usual occupation, although fit for work of a particular character, and as his employers did not state or offer to prove that he could get such employment, the Sheriff was entitled to decide the question of compensation without further evidence.

THIS was a case stated for appeal at the instance of the employers by the Sheriff-substitute at Paisley (Lyell) in an application made on 13th June 1904 by John Bryce & Company, builders, Paisley, to review a weekly payment payable by them under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,* to Peter Connor, labourer, Paisley.

The case set forth:—"On 15th July 1903 the respondent was in the employment of the appellants as a workman, and was on that date engaged, in the course of his employment, at a building . . . when he was accidentally struck in the left eyeball by a chip. His eye was permanently injured, the sight being almost totally destroyed, and he was wholly incapacitated. Accordingly, on 7th December 1903 the appellants were ordained by me to make payment to the respondent of the sum of 11s. 9d. weekly, being 50 per cent of his average weekly earnings for the previous twelve months, and that as from the 29th July 1903, during the respondent's incapacity.

"On April 2, 1904, the respondent was required by the appellants to submit himself for examination by Dr Cluckie, a duly qualified medical practitioner, which he did. Being dissatisfied with Dr Cluckie's certificate, which was communicated to him on 8th April 1904, the respondent elected to submit himself for examination to Dr Fraser, of Paisley, one of the medical referees appointed by the Secretary of State; and accordingly, on 31st May 1904, the matter was referred to Dr Fraser by a joint letter, signed by the respective agents of the parties, which was in these terms:—'Dear Sir,—As medical referee under the Workmen's Compensation Act, you are requested to examine Peter Connor, a mason's labourer, who was injured on or about 15th July 1903, while in the employment of John Bryce & Co., masons, and to report as to his condition at the time of the examination.'

"On 1st June 1904, Dr Fraser granted the following certificate:—'Paisley, 1st June 1904.—I hereby certify that, as medical referee under the Workmen's Compensation Act, I this day examined at 3 Orr Square, Paisley, Peter Connor, mason's labourer, aged 61 years, as to the conditions of his sight. I find that his right eye is healthy and vision good; that the sight of his left eye is materially interfered with as the result of a white scar on the cornea so situated that it obscures the lower and central part of the pupil, so that sight is only possible through the clear parts of the cornea at the sides of this opacity. The left eye is otherwise a healthy eye with free movement possible in every direction, so that it is in a condition to give material help to the sound eye in judging of distances, i.e., it is able to give him some of the advantages of binocular vision. His disability is, however, at present great enough to unfit him for his usual occupation of a mason's labourer, though I am of opinion he is quite fit for any work where he would not have to exercise for the safety of life or limb that nice discrimination as to distances for which the sight of two eyes is necessary. This I certify on soul and conscience. DONALD FRASER, M.D., F.F.P.S. (Glas).'

"Neither party moved for proof; and the respondent having exercised the option given to him by the 11th clause of the First Schedule of the statute, I considered myself bound by the terms of the said clause, as interpreted by the Court in the case of M'Avan v. The Boase Spinning Company, 3 F. 1048, to take Dr Fraser's certificate as conclusive evidence of the respondent's condition, and to exclude any other evidence as incompetent.

"On a proper construction of the said certificate, I found no reason for holding that the respondent's earning capacity had increased to such an extent as to induce me to diminish or end my previous award."

The following questions of law were stated:—"1. Was the Sheriff-substitute right in holding that Dr Fraser's report was conclusive evidence of the respondent's condition, and in excluding as incompetent all other evidence as to the respondent's present earning capacity? or 2. Should he, before deciding the matter, have given parties an opportunity of leading evidence aliunde as to the present capacity of the respondent for earning wages at the kind of employment in which, according to the opinion of the medical referee, he is now able to engage? 3. Assuming that all other evidence is incompetent, then on a proper construction of Dr Fraser's certificate was the Sheriff-substitute bound to diminish or end the weekly payments previously awarded?"

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff-substitute should not have decided the question of compensation without evidence. The medical certificate, under section 11 of Schedule I., was no doubt conclusive as to the workman's physical condition. But the Sheriff, as arbitrator, in fixing the amount of compensation, was directed, by section 2 of that schedule, to take into consideration the "difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident, and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident." He could not determine what the workman was able to earn on a medical certificate which bore that though not fit for his former employment, he was fit for certain kinds of employment. Proof that such employment was attainable, and had been offered to the workman, would be relevant, and the Sheriff should have given the appellants an opportunity to lead it.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—It was settled that the medical certificate was conclusive as to the wage-earning capacity of the workman.[2] Whether, taking his wage-earning capacity as stated by the medical practitioner, the state of the labour market would enable him to earn any wages, was an entirely different question, which was not raised in the present case. If the employers proposed to shew that the workman had had in fact an offer of work for which he was fitted, they were bound to aver that, and offer proof of it. Here they had not done so.

ficate presented to him which had been issued by the statutory medical officer as to the workman's condition. In my opinion he was bound to accept that as conclusive evidence of the workman's condition as at that time. The matter has been considered on more than one occasion before, and that view of the case is in accordance with the decision already pronounced by us in former cases. I am therefore of opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative. As regards the third question, I am of opinion that the Sheriff was entitled, if he thought fit upon the certificate laid before him, which bore that the workman's disability was sufficient to "unfit him for his usual occupation," to decline to alter the scale of compensation then being paid to the workman, and that therefore the third question should be answered in the negative. It will of course be open to the employers to apply again to the Sheriff at any future time, if circumstances should change, either by the condition of the workman changing, so as to enable them to obtain a different certificate, or by the workman actually obtaining employment and receiving pay, or not entering on employment for which he is able.

LORD YOUNG.—The questions of law stated in the case for the opinion of the Court are very distinctly stated. The first is—was the Sheriff-substitute right in holding that Dr Fraser's report was conclusive evidence of the respondent's condition, and in excluding as incompetent all other evidence as to the respondent's present earning capacity. The question depends upon what the Sheriff had to decide. What he had to decide was what amount of compensation should be given to the workman. The case had been before him previously, and he had determined as arbitrator that the applicant's wage-earning capacity had been injured in a manner which entitled him to compensation. He awarded him compensation accordingly by a weekly payment, fixing the amount. But it is distinctly provided by the statute that any weekly payment may on the application of either party to the arbitrator be ended, increased, or diminished, and the application before the Sheriff on this occasion was an application by the employer who was paying the weekly amount ordered by the Sheriff to end it or diminish it. Now, what was the question before the Sheriff upon that application by the employer to end the weekly payment, or if not to end it, then to diminish it? The weekly payment which was in course of being made at the time of the application was upon the footing of total incapacity, and was the maximum amount of weekly payment which the statute allowed in the case of total incapacity. But on the application to end it or diminish it, the Sheriff had again to consider the question arising out of section 1, subsection 3, which provided that the amount of compensation if not settled by agreement should, subject to the provisions of the First Schedule, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the Second Schedule. Now, the First Schedule provides that any weekly payment may on the application of either party be ended, diminished, or increased, and it is distinctly provided that in determining the amount regard should be had to the average earnings of the injured workman before the accident, and the average earnings which he was making or was able to make after the accident. The statute says, in distinct terms, regard is to be had to the average earnings of the injured workman before the accident and the average earnings after it, and the latter necessarily means, in the event of an application to end, diminish, or increase the weekly payment, the average earnings which he is making or able to make at the date of the application. It necessarily means that regard is to be had to these two things in determining the amount.

No. 37.

Bryce & Co. v. Connor.

Now, the question which I venture to put is, can either of these two questions be determined by a medical inspection? The medical inspection with which we are concerned was made under section 11 of the First Schedule. By that schedule a workman receiving compensation is required to submit himself to the inspection of a medical man selected by his employer, and if dissatisfied with the report of the inspection by that medical man, he may—that is the language of the section—he may submit himself to examination by a medical man appointed by the Secretary of State under clause 13 of the Second Schedule.

I may observe that an erroneous expression has been introduced into the stated case here, because the medical man appointed by the Secretary of State is called a medical "referee." The word "referee" is not used in the statute at all and would be quite inapplicable. The Secretary of State has authority to appoint a qualified medical man to give his aid under the Act, and the use or object of the whole of this is to provide medical men who shall give their aid, not at the expense of the parties before the arbitrator, or either of them, but at the expense of the Treasury to be paid out of money voted by Parliament. But there is no such word used in the statute, and no such man intended as is expressed by the word "referee." Now, under this section 11 of the First Schedule, a workman may if he pleases, submit himself, that is to say, his body, to examination by one of these medical men; but I again put the question—could one of these medical men determine or give their aid in determining either of the two matters to which the arbitrator is required by the statute to have regard—the average wages really earned before the accident, and the average wages which he is earning or is capable of earning when the application is made to the Sheriff? I venture to say that these are not questions upon which a report by a medical man under section 11 of the First Schedule can give satisfactorily a conclusive opinion. We happen to know in this case not from the medical report, which can give us no aid in the matter, but from the previous judgment of the Sheriff—and he knew—what were the average wages which the applicant was making before the accident, for he fixed the amount of the weekly payment having regard to that. There was no average earnings or earning capacity at the time the Sheriff so fixed, because he determined then upon the evidence, probably upon the admission of parties, that there was total incapacity to work. But when the application was made to him to end or diminish the weekly payment he had to consider the average wages the applicant was then earning or capable of earning. I venture to say that is not a matter for medical opinion. We have the report here of the medical man who examined the workman's body, and he had no authority to do anything else under section 11 of the First Schedule. It is to this effect, that his left eye was injured, but it had greatly improved. An injured eye which presents the appearance of having been worse, and having greatly improved, may very well be recorded by the medical man who makes the examination, and he does record that the left eye, which was injured by the accident, a splinter having gone into it, had greatly improved. But what were the average earnings or wage-earning capacity of the man at the time? Was that a matter to be determined by the inspection of his eye, and are you to exclude evidence of the fact as to the wages he was earning—it might be to exclude evidence that he was earning just as much as his average earnings before the accident? But according to the view taken by the Sheriff such evidence was incompetent, the Sheriff could not look at anything but the medical report. It was suggested that the Sheriff, looking at the medical report, might be satisfied that there was a wage-earning capacity to some extent, but not to such an extent as to induce him to end or reduce the amount of the weekly payments; and it was said that we had determined in this Court that the maximum amount specified in the statute for total incapacity for work was not confined in its application to the case of total incapacity, but that in the case of partial incapacity the Sheriff might well in the exercise of his judgment give the full amount. That was said to be the true reading of the statute, and if the Sheriff here upon proper evidence had been satisfied in point of fact that the average actual earnings or the earning capacity were only one half of what they had been before he was injured, he was entitled, according to our decision—which I agree in thinking was entirely in accordance with the statute—to give the full amount. But that has no bearing really upon the question whether he could determine the question what was the applicant's capacity for earning wages solely on the report of the medical man.

Now, upon these grounds I am of opinion, and I must say clearly of opinion, that the finding of the Sheriff excluding evidence which was required to enable him to determine whether the weekly payment should be ended or diminished is erroneous. I think he was entitled and bound to admit evidence to shew whether the man was earning wages, and if so, what was the average amount, and if he was not earning wages, what was his capacity to earn them. A medical man could not know that at all except by inquiring, or upon evidence laid before him or upon an investigation made by him, and he does not profess to know it. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that the question of law submitted for our consideration was erroneously regarded and dealt with by the Sheriff, and therefore that he was not right in holding that Dr Fraser's report was conclusive evidence of the respondent's condition. It may have been conclusive evidence of his condition at that time, namely, that his left eye was not so bad as it had been, and was greatly improved. In the case of M'Avan[1] my opinion was that it could not be conclusive even as to the actual condition at the time, that is to say, that it might be affected by evidence that the actual condition at the time was not occasioned by the accident at all, but by some prior or subsequent event, and that might be proved by the medical man himself examined as a witness, and also by the workman examined as a witness. But we have no occasion to consider that here, because it was not a matter of contest or question between the parties that by the accident the left eye was injured, the only question for the Sheriff being as I have said what wages he was actually earning or was capable of earning at the time. I have already said that the term medical "referee" is erroneously used in the statement in the case. There is only one other statement in it on which I have a word to say,—"Neither party moved for proof." I think that was a superfluous statement. We were told that the employer did so—that he desired to lead evidence, but did not make any further motion on the matter, the Sheriff having indicated an opinion which he expresses that any evidence in addition to the report was altogether excluded. The question he put was,—"Should he, before deciding the matter, have given parties an opportunity of leading evidence aliunde as to the present capacity of the respondent for earning wages at the kind of employment in which, according to the opinion of the medical referee, he is now able to engage?" I think his decision on that point was clearly wrong, and we ought accordingly to state our opinion to the effect which I have indicated and expressed.

LORD TRAYNER.—The respondent in this case having received injuries arising out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants was duly awarded compensation in December 1903. In April 1904 he was required by the appellants to submit himself to examination by a medical man nominated by them, and he did so. Being dissatisfied with the report or certificate granted as the result of that examination, the respondent submitted himself to examination by a medical man nominated by the Secretary of State, and on his report the appellants maintain that they are entitled to have the compensation awarded to the respondent either reduced or ended. The Sheriff has refused to do this, and I think his judgment should not be interfered with. It will be observed that the proceedings which have taken place are in strict conformity with those prescribed by the 11th section of the First Schedule of the Act. That being so, I hold the certificate of the medical practitioner nominated by the Secretary of State to be conclusive evidence of the respondent's condition at the time the examination was made. The statute says in express terms that it shall be so, and we have decided that it is so in the case of M'Avan.[1] I see no reason for going back on the question so decided. It may be that the certificate of such a medical man to whom a remit is made under section 13 of the Second Schedule is not conclusive. On that question I offer no opinion, it is not the case before us.

It has been observed that the statute does not call the medical man to be nominated by the Secretary of State a "referee." That is so, but the title is not inappropriate, the language of the statute makes the medical man a referee whose opinion is conclusive on the matter referred to him. I think therefore the title of referee is not inappropriate, and it is certainly convenient. I therefore use it.

In the certificate before us the medical referee says that the respondent is at present "unfit for his usual occupation of a mason's labourer," and if the certificate had ended there, it seems to me no question could have arisen. But the certificate goes on to say that the respondent is fit for any work in which he would not require to exercise for the safety of life or limb that nice discrimination as to distance for which the sight of two eyes is necessary. The certificate is as conclusive on this as it is on the fact that the respondent is not fit for his usual employment. It is plain that the employment for which the respondent is fitted is of a very limited character. But if the appellants had stated that there was work within that limit which they could offer to the respondent, or that such work was obtainable by him if he sought it elsewhere, proof of such a statement of fact would not be excluded by the referee's certificate, because such a statement would be the statement of one of the parties and not a statement of the injured man's condition by the medical referee. Of any such statement the Sheriff might, and probably should, take cognisance, and order such inquiry regarding it as he thought proper. But the appellants here made no such averment, and asked no proof. In these circumstances I think the Sheriff was quite entitled to hold as he did, that there was no sufficient ground for reducing the respondent's allowance.

I am prepared to answer the first question in the affirmative. The second question, I think, should be negatived, because no such proof as is there referred to was asked, and it was no part of the Sheriff's duty to propose allowing such proof. The third question is not, in my opinion, one for us to answer. The Sheriff as arbiter is alone entitled to consider what allowance should in the circumstances be made, and on that question (so long as he keeps within the statutory limit) his judgment is not subject to our review.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed; but the case is exceptional, and I wish to state distinctly my reasons for taking this course.

I think we must consider the case as it was presented to the Sheriff and decided by him, and if this is done it will be seen that the questions which are now put to us are afterthoughts, and do not properly arise out of anything that took place before the Sheriff.

An employer of labour who desires to have a weekly payment ended or diminished is bound, in my opinion, to state to the arbitrator definite grounds for his demand. Now, in the present case the only ground upon which the appellants asked that the weekly payment of 11s. 9d., previously awarded, should be diminished was that this demand was justified by the terms of the certificate of the medical referee. The Sheriff had no further evidence or statement before him, and it is expressly stated in the case that neither party moved for proof. Therefore the Sheriff's decision proceeded entirely upon the terms of the certificate.

As the Sheriff refers to the case of M'Avan v. Boase Spinning Company, Limited,[1] I should like to point out what precisely was decided in that case. It decided no more than this, that the certificate of the medical referee, obtained under subsection 11 of Schedule I., is final and conclusive evidence of the workman's condition at the time—that is, his condition from a medical point of view in regard to his earning capacity, either in his previous occupation or in some other way. The reason why the majority of the Court thought that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment should be reversed was that at his own hand (and even without other proof, which, I think, would have been incompetent) he decided in the teeth of the certificate that the workman had not entirely recovered from the injuries sustained. We could not refuse to give effect to the explicit words of the statute.

Dec. 6, 1904.

Bryce & Co. v. Connor.

The present case is not precisely the same; because while the medical referee certifies that in consequences of the injury to the sight of one eye, the respondent, who is sixty-six years of age, is no longer fit for his usual occupation as mason's labourer, he is fit for any work which can be found for him in which, for the safety of life or limb, he would not require the unimpaired sight of both eyes.

Now, I do not understand that either of the parties dispute that this certificate is final and conclusive as to the workman's condition. It is conclusive against the appellants, in so far as it finds that the respondent is unfit for his usual occupation; and it is conclusive against the respondent, in so far as it finds that he is fit for any work which does not require unimpaired vision of both eyes. But then the appellants did not state to the Sheriff, and offer to prove, what work could be found for the respondent under these conditions; or that the workman was in point of fact earning wages in some other employment. The Sheriff was therefore driven to decide the case upon the certificate alone, and, rightly or wrongly, he held that on the only information before him he had not materials for reducing the weekly allowance.

Coming now to the questions put to us, the first question is ruled by the case of M'Avay.[1] No evidence is competent to contradict the certificate as regards the respondent's present condition.

The second question does not properly arise out of what took place before the Sheriff. I indicate no opinion that proof as to matters which are collateral to and do not contradict a certificate may not be admitted. Certainly the decision in the case of M'Avan[1] does not exclude it. But as no statement or offer of proof of that kind was made to the Sheriff, I do not think we are called upon to answer that question.

As to the third question, I think it was for the Sheriff, and not for us, to decide whether on the terms of the certificate he should or should not diminish or end the weekly payments.

I have only to add that I do not think that it would be proper in this case to remit the case to the Sheriff to allow a proof. We do not even now know precisely what proof the appellants desire.

It is always competent to the appellants to apply again to the Sheriff for a revision of the weekly payments if they are in a position to state facts which they desire to prove, which will not go to contradict the certificate, and which will instruct that there is work which the respondent either has got or might get for which he is fit in his present condition.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Answer the first question of law therein stated in the affirmative, and the second question of law therein stated in the negative: Find and declare accordingly: Therefore affirm the award of the arbitrator, and decern," &c.

In the appeal at the instance of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland and others against Lord Overtoun and others, the House of Lords, on 1st August 1904, pronounced the following judgment:[1]—"That the said interlocutors, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same are hereby, reversed: And it is further ordered, that the cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, with a direction to declare (1) that the association or body of Christians calling themselves the United Free Church of Scotland has no right, title, or interest in any part of the whole lands, properties, sums of money, and others which stood vested, as at the 30th day of October 1900, in the Right Hon. to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this judgment and direction."

The appellants presented a petition praying the Court to apply the judgment, and to declare in terms thereof.

When the case was called in the Single Bills counsel for the appellants moved the Court to grant the prayer of the petition, and maintained that the Court was bound to pronounce an interlocutor in terms of the direction of the House of Lords without delay. The functions of the Court were merely ministerial, and excluded the exercise of any discretion.[1]

Counsel for the respondents moved that the case should be sent to the Summar Roll. He stated that he proposed to put in a minute shewing that the appellants had, since the date of the judgment, admitted that they could not carry on the trust thereby vested in them, and he maintained that the Court were entitled in their discretion to delay pronouncing an interlocutor in terms of the remit from the House of Lords. In answer to a question from Lord Young, he stated that the respondents proposed to apply to Parliament for legislation on the subject.

The Court took time for consideration.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Court has in this matter a purely ministerial duty—the duty to give effect to the judgment of the House of Lords, as the highest constitutional Court of Appeal, by pronouncing a decerniture in accordance with its order. Whether it would be permissible in any circumstances to delay for a time on cause shewn the giving of such an executive judgment may be a question, but I am clearly of opinion that no ground has been brought forward in the present case for departure from the usual practice, under which, when a petition is presented to apply a judgment of the House of Lords, that petition is at once granted as an act of obligatory ministerial duty.

The only grounds hinted at for delay are (1) that the unsuccessful party intends to apply to Parliament to deal with the matter which was in dispute by legislation, and (2) that the petitioners have admitted their inability to administer the trust which as a consequence of the House of Lords judgment will be committed to them—an allegation which is denied. I am unable to see how this Court could be justified in declining to perform the duty laid upon it on any such grounds, and I would therefore move your Lordships to grant the prayer of the petition and to apply the judgment.

LORD YOUNG.—This petition to apply the judgment of the House of Lords, and to decern or declare in the terms therein specified, is one of a familiar character, occurring in the case of every unimplemented judgment of the House of Lords, and invariably granted without opposition, so far as my experience goes. The purpose of such an application, and the purpose of the order or decree upon it, such as is asked here, is to enable the applicants to take such steps as may be necessary for the compulsory enforcing of the judgment, which may require the intervention of officers of the law, from Sheriffs and magistrates down to messengers-at-arms and policemen, and jailors, who perform their duties under the supervising and overseeing power and authority of this Court. No other purpose has ever been, or possibly could be achieved by the application of any House of Lords judgment, such as the petitioners before us now desire. The judgment of the House of Lords is in itself final and conclusive, and this Court cannot change it in any way, or even criticise it, or properly permit it to be criticised, whether favourably or unfavourably, in any debate on the petition to apply. The motion of the respondents just now before us, and which was made when the petition was in the Single Bills, is only this—that we should in the meanwhile delay dealing with the petition. That motion was made in the view that this was an exceptional case, and that it was in the legitimate interests of a great multitude of people in this country, in the legitimate interests of the public, and reasonable in itself, that our interposition now to pronounce the first step with the view to the compulsory enforcement of the decree should be delayed. The existence or non-existence of any discretionary power on the part of this Court to delay giving decree for the application of the judgment is a question which I thought worthy of argument. If it does not exist, there is, of course, an end of the matter; we must grant decree as in a case presenting no exceptional circumstances for our delaying to grant decree as we usually do, so far as I know. As I have already said, such an application is never opposed. I never knew it opposed, and therefore the Court was never, as it is now, asked to delay granting it. Here we are asked to delay granting it upon the ground that the case is of an exceptional character, and that it is reasonable in the apparent interests of a very large part of the public of Scotland, that we should delay. Now, what are these circumstances? The judgment—the soundness of which I assume, and I shall not indicate any impression whatever against its soundness in every respect—the import of the judgment, and, indeed, the expression of it in language which is not doubtful, is to take the whole property that belonged to the Free Church before the union with the United Presbyterian Church from those in whose possession it now is, and to hand it over to those who dissented from the Union. That is to say, to put the congregations of the United Church—the Church which was united in October 1900—out of possession of the churches of which they have always hitherto been in possession, and the ministers out of the manses in which they have always hitherto dwelt, and to remove them from any use or enjoyment by them of the funds from which to a large extent the stipends of the ministers and the expenses of administration of the whole affairs of the Church must come—to hand that all over at once, I assume in pursuance of the very sound judgment—a judgment which may be found to be so, and which I regard as being so at present—and to put all that property, heritable and moveable, amounting in value to a number of millions, into the hands of a very small minority not one in a hundred, but about one in a thousand of those who agreed to the Union.

Now, if the judgment is to stand, if it is not to be interfered with by any power obtained to interfere with it, that must be the result, for the judgment is to the effect that such use and enjoyment and application of these funds as have been made during the last four years have been in breach of trust, so gross breach of trust that the trustees in whose possession it was and who made that expenditure, have to restore all the money out of which they made that expenditure. That may not be asked, but it is the effect of the judgment. Now, what we were told upon this motion, the only motion before us, is that we should delay pronouncing decree, which is the first step towards the compulsory enforcement of the judgment, that is the compulsory ejection from houses, and churches, and manses, and the stoppage of any payment from the funds which existed in the hands of the Free Church prior to October 1900—we were told in support of the motion that we should delay doing so in the meantime, that there was no urgency in the matter unless we thought it urgent that that should be immediately done, and we were assured, and I cannot take the assurance as idle, that the whole case was to be brought before Parliament. It may be by the Government of to-day—the proper officer of the Government of to-day, the Secretary for Scotland, or the Prime Minister, or any others; but if not brought before Parliament by the Government for their judgment upon the matter, it would, we were assured, be brought by one or more Members of Parliament either in one House or the other. I cannot but take the statement, coming as it did from responsible counsel representing such a body as the United Free Church of Scotland, that that is to be done. How Parliament may deal with it in the bill or in any other Parliamentary process, bringing the question before them—whether this divestiture of such numbers of people and investiture with the property of a few—whether that is to stand and be enforced—will be a matter for the consideration of Parliament. It would be very unbecoming on my part to indicate any opinion or any expression of opinion, if I had any, as to how Parliament would deal with it. If they refuse to deal with it at all, and leave the matter to the law without any intervention on their part, then the result will be undoubtedly that the judgment will stand and must be enforced with whatever force the law can afford to those desirous to enforce it. It must be enforced as it stands. It was represented to us that it was just possible that Parliament might take another view and interfere, and therefore it was reasonable that we in the meantime should delay our interposition to give immediate enforcement of the judgment, and the motion made to us in the Single Bills was that the case should go to the Summar Roll for argument upon the question as to whether it is within our power, if we thought it would be just and reasonable to do it, to delay in the meantime to grant the application in this petition—to allow it to stand off in the meantime.

Now, we were told by Mr Guthrie that he had a good deal to say on the matter, and that he had even facts to bring before us in the matter as to the consequences of handing over this estate to the minority who dissented from the Union, and who are now the Free Church. He desired to have the matter argued, and his concluding motion was that the matter should be sent to the Summar Roll, where arguments might be heard. I thought that was a reasonable motion, and I hesitate to express any opinion upon the question —although I have an opinion upon it—that we have the power to delay, if we think it is just and reasonable to exercise it. I should desire argument upon that, as such was the desire of the party who made the motion, and I should desire all the assistance that could be given to the Court by argument upon either side or any authority quoted by either side. Your Lordships are of another opinion, and think that the matter is so clear and so urgent that it would be unreasonable to listen to the request for any delay, and that we should put the successful party in the House of Lords into the position of now being able to invoke all the powers of the law and legal officers in order to enforce the immediate execution of the decree. As to the propriety or impropriety of granting delay, I should like to have had further argument from both sides. I think it is a proper matter for argument on both sides, and in accordance with the motion made by the respondents I think that the case should be sent to the Summar Roll for full discussion. Upon that matter your Lordships, I was informed only, I think, the day before yesterday, had come to a different opinion, and thought there was no occasion for argument at all, and that argument ought not to be allowed. I was desirous of having even the present advising put off — having heard that opinion only the day before yesterday—until next week, that I might consider the matter more carefully and be able to express my views more carefully than I have done; but your Lordships were of opinion that even that delay, which I personally requested, ought not to be granted, but that the prayer of the petition ought at once to receive effect. I assume that is the correct view of the majority of the Court and that that is to be done, but I must, in justice to my own views, express what I have done on the subject. I think we ought not to grant the prayer of the petition until we have heard argument as to whether or not it is within our discretion to delay dealing with the matter, and also whether there are grounds for exercising that discretion in the way moved for by the defenders and respondents.

LORD TRAYNER.—The House of Lords have remitted to us to pronounce a certain order. The terms of that remit are not ambiguous or open to construction. The petitioners now ask us to give effect to the remit by pronouncing an order in conformity therewith. The defenders move us to delay pronouncing any order, and ask in effect an opportunity of shewing cause why the order asked by the petitioners should not be pronounced. I think there is no occasion, and indeed no room, for any such discussion as that which the defenders ask us to hear. The duty which the remit from the House of Lords imposes on us is not in any proper sense judicial. It is purely ministerial. Our only duty is to do what we have been requested to do, and we have no choice or discretion in the matter. What may be the consequences of our present decree are matters of which we can take no account. I am therefore of opinion that the prayer of the petition should be granted de plano.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships that we should, without further discussion, pronounce decree of declarator in terms of the third and sixth conclusions of the summons.

The House of Lords has remitted this case with explicit and unambiguous directions to do so.

It is not open to us to question the judgment of the House of Lords, nor the binding authority of the remit; and it is equally beyond our power, were we so disposed, to delay giving effect to the remit from any considerations of consequences which may follow upon decree of declarator being pronounced—consequences which it must be presumed the noble and learned Lords foresaw when they pronounced judgment.

In these circumstances, there being no dispute as to the form or meaning of the remit, discussion is, and, in my opinion, was from the first incompetent.

Mr Guthrie, however, was allowed to state his objections at considerable length, but he did not state a relevant or practicable reason for granting delay, and did not cite a single authority for departing from our well-established constitutional duty to give implicit obedience to the orders of the Court of last resort without question or delay. If authority were required for the course we propose to adopt I may refer to the opinion of Lord Redesdale in the case of Stewart,[1] and that of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Stuart v. Moore.[2]

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the prayer of the petition.

At that date the father had not acquired a residential settlement in Montrose, and, in March 1877, Brechin, the parish of the father's birth, admitted liability for the relief given to the son. In May 1877 the father had acquired a residential settlement in Montrose, unless he was to be regarded as a pauper in respect of the relief given to his son in 1876. The son was never forisfamiliated or able to maintain himself. In September 1891 he was placed in an asylum as a pauper lunatic by order of the Sheriff, and was subsequently supported there by the parish of Brechin.

On 6th October 1897 Brechin gave Montrose the statutory notice claiming repayment of the charges incurred on behalf of the pauper.

In an action by Brechin against Montrose for repayment of its disbursement since 6th October 1896, one year before the statutory notice, held that Montrose was liable, on the grounds (1) that the son followed the settlement of his father; (2) that the father was not made a pauper by the relief given to his son in 1876, and had acquired a residential settlement in Montrose in May 1877; and (3) that the admission of liability properly made by Brechin in March 1877 was not binding after the father had acquired a residential settlement in Montrose.

1st Division. LdStormonth-Darling.

WILLIAM CROCKET was born in Marykirk on 4th November 1862. John Crocket, his father, was born in Brechin, and resided for some time in Marykirk. At Whitsunday 1872 he went to reside in Montrose, and remained there till his death in August 1898. On 15th August 1878 he was admitted to the poor's-roll of Montrose on the ground that he had a residential settlement there, and repeatedly received relief until his death.

In 1874 William Crocket lost his right hand by an accident, and was then and continued to be of weak mind and incapable of earning his livelihood. William Crocket first received parochial outdoor relief from Montrose on 11th November 1876, at which date he was residing in family with his father. This relief was continued till 11th April 1877. A claim for the relief thus afforded was made by Montrose on Brechin on the ground that William Crocket was not forisfamiliated, and that, his father having no residential settlement, the parish of his father's birth was liable. By letter, dated 6th March 1877, the Inspector of Poor of Brechin admitted this claim, and the advances made by Montrose were repaid by Brechin.

On 11th April 1877 William Crocket was placed in Montrose Royal Lunatic Asylum as a pauper lunatic by order of the Sheriff. He was discharged from the Asylum "recovered" on 18th December 1877. He was again sent to the Asylum from 12th May 1879 until 9th March 1891. On 11th September 1891 he was once more placed in the Asylum by order of the Sheriff,* and had since remained there supported by the parish of Brechin.

In the intervals when William Crocket was not confined in the Asylum he wandered about the country supporting himself by begging; he was imprisoned on two occasions for assault, and was also an inmate of poorhouses for short periods. He returned occasionally to his father's or mother's house, but was entirely beyond their control. From bodily and mental weakness he had never been able to maintain himself.

On 6th October 1897 the Inspector of Poor of Brechin gave notice in terms of section 71 of the Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845,[1] and section 78 of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857,[2] to the Inspector of Poor of Montrose claiming relief and repayment of the charges incurred on behalf of William Crocket. A similar notice was sent to the Inspector of Poor of Marykirk on 25th October 1895.

On 23d April 1903 the Parish Council of Brechin brought an action against the Parish Council of Montrose for repayment of the sum disbursed on behalf of William Crocket from one year prior to the date on which the statutory notice of claim was sent to the defenders. The sums so disbursed were not in dispute.

The action was also directed against the Parish Council of Marykirk, in which parish the pauper was born, but it is not necessary to refer to their defence, which was sustained.

Both defenders denied liability.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said William Crocket having been born in the parish of Marykirk, the pursuers are entitled to decree against the Parish Council of that parish. (2) Or otherwise, the said William Crocket not having been forisfamiliated, and being of weak intellect, the pursuers are entitled to decree against the Parish Council of Montrose as the parish of his father's settlement.

The Parish Council of Montrose pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers' predecessors having, through their inspector of poor, admitted liability to these defenders' predecessors for the relief of the said pauper on 6th March 1877, the pursuers are barred from insisting in the present action as against these defenders. (4) The pauper's father not having acquired a settlement in the parish of Montrose, these defenders are entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses. (5) Separatim, the said William Crocket having been born in the parish of Marykirk, and having been forisfamiliated, the Parish Council thereof, and not the Parish Council of Montrose, are liable to relieve the pursuers. (6) Alternatively, the said William Crocket's settlement is, and has been since 1876, in the parish of Brechin.

A proof, which was allowed and led, established the facts set forth above.*

On 10th June 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) decerned against the Parish Council of Montrose for payment and relief in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and assoilzied the Parish Council of Marykirk.†

* At the proof John Spalding, Inspector of Poor for the parish of Montrose, stated,—"At the time William Crocket was relieved in 1876, I believe his father had been for some time invalided. It appears from the register, of which No. 27 is an excerpt, that John Crocket had been invalided for more than two and a half years before December 1877, and from No. 29 that he had been an invalid for three years prior to August 1878. The letter, No. 25, from Montrose to Marykirk of 13th November 1876 bears that he had been invalided for eighteen months."

† "OPINION.—The pauper in this case was born in the parish of Marykirk on 4th November 1862. He first received parochial relief from the parish of Montrose on 14th November 1876, and he has continued a pauper, with some quite insignificant intervals, ever since. On 14th November 1876 he was residing in family with his father, who was at that time, so far as the evidence goes, an able-bodied man; but the boy had, through an accident, lost his right hand, and he had always been somewhat weak-minded. A claim for the relief thus afforded was made by Montrose on the parish of Brechin, which was the parish of the father's birth, and the claim was, by letter of 6th March 1877, admitted by Brechin, there being no doubt that the lad, though a few days over the age of fourteen, was still in point of fact resident with and dependent upon his father, and there being also no doubt that the father had not at that time acquired any residential settlement.

"On 11th April 1877 the lad was admitted to the Montrose Lunatic Asylum by order of the Sheriff, but he was discharged on 18th December 1877. On 12th May 1879, however, he was again certified as a lunatic and readmitted to the Montrose Asylum, and once more, after an absence of only a few weeks, he was certified and readmitted on 11th September 1891. He still remains an inmate of the asylum on the Sheriff's order of 1891.

"Now, the Lunacy Act of 1857, by section 75, provides 'that every pauper lunatic detained in any district asylum under this Act shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such Brechin Parish Council v. Montrose Parish Council.

The Parish Council of Montrose reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The relief given to William Crocket, the son, in 1876 was in effect relief given to John Crocket, the father, who then became a pauper, and could not acquire a residential settlement in Montrose. The fact that the father was invalided * and not able-bodied distinguished this case from the cases of Milne v. Henderson and Smith[1] and Milne v. Ross.[2] Brechin was therefore liable as the parish of the father's birth. (2) Alternatively, the son had become chargeable to Brechin in his own right in 1876. He had never been rehabilitated, and therefore Brechin remained liable throughout.[3] The case of Beattie v. Wood[4] was distinguished, because there the pauper had been rehabilitated. Brechin had deliberately admitted liability in 1877, and that admission could not be withdrawn.[5]

Argued for the pursuers, the Parish Council of Brechin;—(1) Relief given to a lunatic son living with his father, who was able-bodied asylum was granted, and the expense of his maintenance at such district asylum shall be defrayed by such parish accordingly.' I am not sure whether Montrose is, strictly speaking, a 'district asylum,' but that is of no consequence, because it is at all events a public asylum, and the case of Palmer v. Russell, 10 Macph. 185, decides that there is no distinction in respect of chargeability between a pauper lunatic in a district asylum and a pauper lunatic in any other lawful asylum to which the Sheriff may have sent the lunatic. Accordingly the question of liability for the expense of this pauper's maintenance since 11th September 1891 must depend on what was the parish of his legal settlement at that date.

"Now, at that date there had been a change of circumstances from those existing on 6th March 1877, when the parish of Brechin made its formal and deliberate admission of liability. The change was this: John Crocket, the pauper's father, had at Whitsunday 1877 completed the period necessary to give him a residential settlement in the parish of Montrose, and he had been admitted to the poor's-roll of that parish on 15th August 1878. From that time onwards till his death in 1898 he retained his residential settlement, and was from time to time relieved by Montrose. Montrose now maintains, contrary to its own action at and subsequent to August 1878, that John Crocket, the father, never acquired a residential settlement. The contention is founded on the view that the relief afforded to the son on 14th November 1876 had the effect of pauperising the father; but that seems to me contrary to the decisions in Milne v. Henderson, 7 R. 317, and Milne v. Ross, 11 R. 273.

"If, then, there was a material change of circumstances after the time when Brechin made its formal admission of liability on 6th March 1877, I am of opinion that Brechin is not bound by that admission. I admit that in Beattie v. Arbuckle, 2 R. 330, Young v. Gow, 4 R. 448, and several other cases, it was decided that where one parish has deliberately admitted to another liability for the support of a pauper, it cannot withdraw that admission and open up the question of liability on the ground that the admission was made in error either as to the facts or as to the law. But it is fully and able to earn wages, did not pauperise the father.[1] It had not been proved that John Crocket, the father, was not able-bodied in 1876. It was not sufficient to prove that he was in bad health.[2] The father had therefore acquired a residential settlement in Montrose, and the son followed his father's settlement. (2) Brechin had rightly admitted liability in 1877 as the parish of the father's birth, because at that time the father had no residential settlement. That admission, however, was only binding so long as the circumstances remained the same,[3] and had no effect after the father had acquired a residential settlement in Montrose.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This action is brought by the parish of Brechin against the parishes of Montrose and Marykirk, in order to recover from one or other of them the amount of certain disbursements made by the parish of Brechin in respect of a pauper—William Crocket. The amount of the disbursements is not in question.

The pauper, William Crocket, is at present an inmate of Montrose Lunatic Asylum, where he is detained under an order for his reception, granted by the Sheriff-substitute of the county of Forfar, of date 14th September 1891.

The 75th section of the Lunacy Act of 1857 provides that a pauper recognised in these cases that, although a deliberate admission must be treated as having been good when it was made, and therefore not to be gone back upon, circumstances may emerge to render it no longer binding. Thus Lord Gifford in Arbuckle's case says,—'If, then, the admission be binding, the only question that remains is, for how long? The answer is, as long as the pauper is chargeable and the circumstances remain the same.' Here I do not proceed on the specialty that Montrose knew the fact of its having admitted John Crocket, the father, to the poor's-roll, and did not communicate that fact to Brechin, because I do not impute mala fides to Montrose in thus failing to communicate a fact which it probably regarded as immaterial. It is enough, in my view, that there was a change of circumstances, and that Brechin was not to blame for not sooner discovering the change. The only effect of its not having been discovered earlier is greatly to limit the period for which Brechin can have recourse against Montrose. The disbursements for which repayment is sued date only from 6th October 1896, i.e., from one year preceding the written notice required by the statute. For these disbursements I think Montrose is liable.

"There is no case against Marykirk, because the pauper has never been self-supporting in the sense of the poor-law. He has always either been in receipt of relief or has lived (for very short periods) by begging. His settlement therefore has been all along derivative. It was the father's birth parish, viz., Brechin, till Whitsunday 1877, when the father acquired a residential settlement, viz., Montrose. As Brechin was liable at the date of the lunatic's first admission to the asylum on 11th April 1877, the 75th section of the Lunacy Act had the effect of continuing Brechin's liability till his discharge on 18th December in that year. But after that date, and particularly at the crucial date of his final admission on 11th September 1891, the liability lay no longer on the parish of the father's birth, but on the parish of the father's residence."

lunatic detained in an asylum shall be chargeable to the parish of his settlement at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted.

The question, therefore, in this case is what was the parish of settlement of William Crocket on 14th September 1891—and that leads to the consideration of his past history.

He was born in the parish of Marykirk on 4th November 1862. When quite young he lost his right hand by an accident, and was then and is still of weak mind and incapable of earning a livelihood.

He was in the Montrose Lunatic Asylum from April 1877 until 18th December of that year, when he was discharged cured.

He was again in the asylum from 12th May 1879 till 9th March 1891, when he was discharged cured, and, as has been stated, he was again received in the asylum on 14th September of that year, where he remains.

In the intervals, when he was not confined in the lunatic asylum, he seems to have wandered about the country supporting himself by begging. He was in prison on two occasions for short periods, for assaults; he was also an inmate of poorhouses for short periods, and he returned occasionally to his father's or mother's house. He was, however, entirely beyond their control and never remained long with them. From bodily and mental weakness he has never been able to maintain himself.

He has never been forisfamiliated, or acquired an independent settlement for himself.

On 13th November 1876 he received parochial relief in the shape of weekly payments from the parish of Montrose where he was living in family with his father. These payments ceased on the 5th April 1877.

Montrose as the relieving parish claimed relief from the parish of Brechin as being the parish of his father, John Crocket's settlement, and that claim was admitted by Brechin on 6th March 1877. Brechin was the father's birth settlement.

At Whitsunday 1877, however, John Crocket had resided in Montrose for the five years requisite to give him a residential settlement there. On the 15th August 1878 he was admitted to the poor's-roll of that parish on the ground that he had a residential settlement there. From that time until his death in August 1898 there is no doubt that Montrose recognised him as having a settlement in that parish, and repeatedly gave him parochial relief. It is now maintained, however, by Montrose that this was done in error, and that the relief given to his son in November 1876 had the effect of pauperising the father, and therefore that he had never acquired a residential settlement in Montrose.

It was settled, however, in the case of Milne v. Henderson,[1] and Milne v. Ross,[2] that relief given to a son, who was unable to maintain himself, had not the effect of pauperising the father.

It was maintained, however, that these cases were distinguishable from the present in respect that in each of them the father was an able-bodied man and was not, therefore, and could not be, a proper object of parochial relief, whereas in this case the father was not an able-bodied man but was "invalided," whatever that may mean.

No. 39.

Dec. 6, 1904. Brechin Parish Council v. Montrose Parish Council.

There is no evidence to shew what John Crocket's bodily condition was at this time, or how he maintained himself, but the cardinal fact is not disputed that he had never applied for or received parochial relief, and accordingly when he had completed his five years of residence in Montrose he acquired a residential settlement in that parish.

I think, accordingly, that subsequent to Whitsunday 1877 William Crocket had a derivative residential settlement in the parish of Montrose. If that be so, I do not understand it to be disputed that Montrose continues to be the parish of his settlement.

It was further maintained by Montrose on the authority of the cases of Arbuckle[1] and Young,[2] that Brechin could not insist in its present claim of relief, being bound by the admission of liability for the pauper given on 6th March 1877. It appears to me that these cases have no application to the present case. What was decided in these cases was that an admission made as to the liability for a pauper was binding on the parish making it, and could not be withdrawn, although made in error as to the true facts of the case. But in this case when the admission was made, there was no error as to the facts, because Brechin was liable as the parish of the father's settlement, as it then was, and rightly made the admission.

The admission, no doubt, was binding so long as William Crocket was receiving relief in 1876 and 1877, but when that chargeability ceased, so also the admission made with regard to it ceased to have any further binding effect. The admission made by Brechin must be taken as true at the time it was made, i.e., that John Crocket the father then had a birth settlement in Brechin. But when John Crocket acquired a residential settlement in Montrose, the admission had no bearing on the new facts of the case, and did not affect the liability of Montrose to aliment the pauper son, whose settlement followed that of the father. It is not the law that an admission of liability rightly made in one set of circumstances is binding in a totally different set of circumstances. There is no evidence that Brechin knew of, or made any admission of liability, with reference to the new state of facts which had emerged since their admission of liability in 1877.

These were the only questions argued to us, and I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right and should be adhered to.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The steamship "City of Edinburgh" while being towed out of the Queen's Dock at Glasgow by two tugs, and while compulsorily in charge of a pilot, collided with the "Glassford" which was lying moored to the quay. At the time of the collision the "City of Edinburgh's" anchors were not available for use, as the windlass was under repair.

In an action by the owners of the "Glassford," against the owners of the "City of Edinburgh" for damages for the collision, the defenders maintained that the pilot was in fault in moving the ship when her anchors were not available for use. It was proved that the pilot was aware of the want of anchors, but was not consulted as to whether it was safe to move the ship without them. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the use of anchors would have averted the collision.

Held that the defenders had not overcome the presumption of fault against them, as the owners of a moving ship colliding with one that was stationary, by proving that their ship was compulsorily in charge of a pilot at the time, as they had not proved that the collision was due to the fault of the pilot.

Observed that if the pilot was in fault in moving the vessel without having available anchors, the defenders were also in fault in not having the vessel duly equipped.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ON 21st September 1903 the steamship "City of Edinburgh," belonging to the Ellerman Lines, Limited, collided with the steamship "Glassford," belonging to Mann, Macneal, & Company, Glasgow.

At the time of the collision the "Glassford" was lying moored to the quay at the west end of the Queen's Dock, Glasgow. The "City of Edinburgh" was being towed out of the dock by two tugs. She was under the charge of a duly licensed pilot, pilotage being compulsory in that part of the Clyde.

The "Glassford" was injured by the collision.

Mann, Macneal, & Company brought the present action for damages, in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against the Ellerman Lines, Limited.

The pursuers averred;—"The collision was due entirely to the fault or negligence of those in charge of the 'City of Edinburgh.' Explained that the 'City of Edinburgh' was not in a safe and proper condition for navigating the harbour; in particular, the tugs employed were not sufficiently powerful to keep her under control in the weather prevailing at the time, and her anchors were not ready to be let go."

The defenders answered;—"At the time of the collision the navigation of the s.s. 'City of Edinburgh' was in charge of a duly licensed pilot, and the vessel was being navigated in waters to which compulsory pilotage applied. Two tugs were employed, and every precaution taken by defenders to enable the 'City of Edinburgh' to be safely navigated. It is stated by the pilot, and is believed and averred, that just as the vessel was about to be straightened for taking the entrance to the gate to get out of the Queen's Dock, involving at all times a delicate operation, a sudden heavy and unexpected gust of wind occurred, and that in the circumstances no one can be blamed for the accident. Explained in answer that the pilot knew the power of the tugs and as to the condition of the anchors before undertaking the piloting, and the vessel was completely under control of the tugs. If there was any negligence, the whole navigation being in charge of the pilot, the defenders are freed from liability."

The defenders pleaded;—Said collision not having occurred from any fault of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible, they should be assoilzied, with expenses.

A proof was taken. It was proved that on the occasion in question the windlass of the "City of Edinburgh" was being repaired, so that her anchors were not available for use. It was also proved that the pilot was aware of this fact, but was not consulted as to whether it was safe to move her in that condition. The import of the evidence on the question whether the collision might have been avoided by the use of anchors is fully detailed in the note of the Sheriff-substitute, infra.

On 8th July 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced an interlocutor in which he made, inter alia, the following findings:—"Finds that when the 'City of Edinburgh' was being squared up to the entrance, the 'Vanguard' being on the port bow and the 'Warrior' astern, a squall is said to have struck the starboard quarter of the 'City of Edinburgh' and brought her head to the north, and she ran into the starboard side of the 'Glassford,' but she struck the 'Glassford' with very little force and a space of 2 feet more would have avoided the collision: Finds that the squall struck the 'City of Edinburgh' when she was a distance of at least 200 feet from the 'Glassford,' and if an anchor had been dropped from the 'City of Edinburgh' when the squall struck her the collision would have been avoided: Finds that the tugs 'Vanguard' and 'Warrior' are powerful tugs, and they were strong enough to control the movements of the 'City of Edinburgh' on that occasion: Finds, however, that the anchors of the 'City of Edinburgh' were not available that morning, as the windlass had been sent ashore to get repaired, and part of it was taken on board just before the steamer started: Finds that the 'City of Edinburgh' is provided with patent anchors, and these are very often at the hawse pipe when the defenders' steamers are in dock, and if one of these anchors had been dropped from the port bow on the occasion in question the collision would have been avoided, and such anchors can be used in the dock: Finds that the defenders (on whom the onus lies) have failed to prove that a sudden, heavy, and unexpected gust of wind occurred which placed the 'City of Edinburgh' beyond the control of the tugs: Finds, under these circumstances, that the collision was caused through the failure of the defenders to have the patent anchors of the steamer ready for use, and that there was no such heavy squall of wind as to place the 'City of Edinburgh' beyond control of the tugs: Therefore finds the defenders liable in damages." *

* "NOTE.—The steamship 'Glassford' was lying moored at the quay, and the 'City of Edinburgh' was being towed out of the dock in charge of two tugs, but without her own steam. The pursuers aver that the collision was caused by the 'City of Edinburgh' not being in a safe condition for navigating the harbour, in respect that the tugs were not sufficiently powerful to keep her under control, and her anchors were not ready to be let go. The defenders, on the other hand, say that the collision was caused by a sudden, heavy, and unexpected gust of wind, and that it was an inevitable accident.

"It is quite clear from the authorities that the onus is on the defenders to prove that the collision arose from inevitable accident, and not from negligent navigation.—See Marsden on Collisions at Sea, pages 35 and 36." (The Sheriff-substitute then dealt with the evidence as to a sudden squall arising on the occasion in question, and as to the alleged insufficiency of the

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There was no real distinction here between the present case and the case of The "Springburn," [1] referred to by the Sheriff-substitute. The collision was due either to inevitable accident, arising from the exceptional squall which came on at the time, or to the fault of the pilot. It was submitted that inevitable accident was proved. The ship was being moved under competent management, in the ordinary way, and was deflected from her course by a sudden gust. If, on the other hand, the collision was due to the fault of the pilot there was no doubt that the owners were not responsible. The evidence shewed that the ship's anchors, even if they had been ready for use, would not have prevented the collision. But even on the assumption that the anchors would have prevented the collision, the defenders were not liable. The ship was compulsorily in charge of a pilot, and it was part of his duty to see that she was fully equipped for navigation,

"With regard to the question as to the anchors, this is a matter which relates to the equipment of the 'City of Edinburgh' and which concerns the owners themselves and not the pilot. The master and crew are held responsible for having the anchor clear and ready to let go when the pilot gives the order, and the owner or the master is responsible for the sufficiency of the ship as regards tackle and equipment for the purposes of navigation.—See Marsden, pages 265 and 269. The question therefore is whether the anchors ought to have been ready for use in the dock on the occasion in question. It must be kept in view that it would have taken very little to keep the 'City of Edinburgh' clear of the 'Glassford,' as the evidence goes to shew that the 'City of Edinburgh' touched the 'Glassford' very lightly, and 2 feet more would have cleared her. The 'City of Edinburgh' being the vessel in motion was bound by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill to have an anchor ready for dropping, and to have dropped it if that would have avoided the collision. It is idle to say that in a space of 200 feet, which was the distance between the alleged sheer and the 'Glassford,' a dropped anchor would not have brought her up to the extent of 2 feet. The evidence on the subject, while differing to some extent, is in favour of the anchor being ready and being used under such circumstances. Both the first and second mates of the 'Glassford' say that the anchors should be ready—9 A and 10 C. And the latter says that if the anchors had been let go when he saw the 'City of Edinburgh' about 300 feet off that would have saved the collision, and he says that she was stopped when about 300 feet off (10 B). M'Kellar, the deputy-harbour-master, says that possibly the dropping of the anchors would have saved the collision, she touched very gently, and he believes that if the anchors had been dropped at the time the 'Vanguard' stopped, the 'City of Edinburgh' would have been pulled up in time, and he says that anchors are used in the dock (14 F and G). M'Kellar afterwards says (20 F), that he does not think he would attribute fault to the 'City of Edinburgh' on account of her not dropping her anchors, but of course if she had dropped her anchors it might have saved the collision. This last statement is somewhat contradictory, but under the special circumstances of this case I would distinctly say that there was fault on the part of the 'City of Edinburgh' in not dropping her anchors when the result would have been to save the collision. Furthermore, we have evidence from the defenders' witnesses as to the dropping of an anchor. Andrew Muir, the first mate of and his failure to fulfil that duty imposed liability on him, and not upon the owners.[1] A pilot was not bound to serve on a ship; he could refuse if his requirements were not complied with. If he took the risk of incomplete equipment he incurred liability, and relieved the owners.

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—It was established law that when a moving ship collided with a ship moored to a quay, the onus lay on the former to prove that she was not in fault.[2] Here the defenders endeavoured to discharge that onus by averring (first) inevitable accident, and (secondly) fault of the pilot. Neither had been proved. Even granted there was an exceptional squall (which, it was submitted, the defenders had failed to prove), that was not enough. There were many ways in which the "City of Edinburgh" could have kept in her course in spite of the squall. She might have had her steam up; she might have had stronger tugs. A colli-

the 'City of Edinburgh,' says that ships without steam are shifted in the Queen's Dock without the assistance of anchors (which of course may be true enough), and it did not occur to him as absolutely necessary that the anchors should be ready before the 'City of Edinburgh' started, and they generally put their trust in the strength of the tug boats and the towlines (33 A). It will be noticed how qualified these statements are, and he afterwards says that the effect of dropping an anchor over the port bow would stop the ship if they had plenty of room, and it has a tendency to throw her bow to the left. It would surely be plenty of room (as I have already indicated) in which to stop the ship when she had to go 200 feet and 2 feet only of that space were required to prevent her touching the 'Glassford.' Peter Arthur, the pilot, says (40 C and E) that he was not aware until he went on board that the windlass was ashore, but he has never used an anchor in the fifteen years he has been doing the shifting of the City Line steamers in the harbour, and that he very seldom bothers much about the anchors (44 C), and he admits that if he had dropped his anchors when squaring up for the dock gates it might and it might not have avoided the collision. He tries to get out of this position by saying that there was a danger of the anchor going through the vessel's bottom, but he afterwards says that that would have no influence on him as to whether he should use the anchor or not. John Forsyth, another deputy harbour-master, who was examined for the defenders (but who was in the harbour-house at the entrance to the dock when the collision took place), says that it was safe enough to shift the 'City of Edinburgh' from the Queen's Dock to the Prince's Dock without steam and without anchors being ready for use, and David Anderson, who holds the important position of marine superintendent of the defenders' line, says (50 C) the same thing, but Anderson admits that in the dock the patent anchors are very often at the hawse pipe, and (51 G) he admits that sometimes the anchors of ships are in readiness when they are in dock, and when they are going over to the Govan dock they very often get them ready for use in the river, and they could be used in the dock. As to whether or not they would be very useful in dock he says that that would depend on circumstances.

"The result of all this evidence appears to me to be that the wise and cautious proceeding is to have the patent anchors ready for use, and when sion could not be said to be due to inevitable accident when the colliding ship omitted to take precautions which would have prevented it. It was no answer to say that it was the custom in the Queen's Dock to move ships as the "City of Edinburgh" was moved. No doubt it was lawful, but the ship which did so took the risk, and would be liable in the event of a collision.[1] Nor had the defenders established fault on the part of the pilot. The evidence shewed that if the anchors had been available and had been used the collision would not have happened. The want of anchors in working order was a defect in the equipment of the ship for which the owners, and not the pilot, were responsible, even if the pilot was aware of it.[2] The cases of The "Strathspey"[3] and The "Assyria"[4] were clearly distinguishable. In the former the pilot had voluntarily taken up a position in which he could not control the course of the ship, in the latter he had been consulted as to the defect in equipment, and had elected to run the risk. But even assuming fault on the part of the pilot that did not exonerate the defenders.[5] Both owners and pilot might be in fault, and here it was clearly fault on the part of the owners not to have the anchors of the ship in working order.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—On 21st September 1903, early in the forenoon, the defenders' vessel, the "City of Edinburgh," while being removed from the Queen's Dock in Glasgow harbour, and while under way, came into collision with the "Glassford," belonging to the pursuers, then lying stationary at it is a question of the ship in motion making a narrow shave with regard to the ship at rest she ought to take all precautions that can be readily taken, and which are usually taken, to avoid a collision. In this case we have it from the pilot of the 'City of Edinburgh' that the dropping of an anchor might have avoided the collision, and that the fact of the dropped anchor damaging the bottom of the 'City of Edinburgh' would not influence him in not dropping it, and we have it from the marine superintendent of the line that in their ships they leave the patent anchors very often at the hawse pipe in the docks, that they can be used in the dock, and that it would depend on circumstances whether they would be very useful in the dock. For my part I can picture no circumstances in which an anchor would have been more useful than in bringing up a steamer 2 feet within the space of 200 feet.

"The defenders' agent founded on the case of the 'Springburn,' which was decided in the Court of Session on 30th June 1893 on an appeal from this Court. But that case, though somewhat similar to the present, differs from it in these essential particulars—that the 'Springburn' had been newly launched and was in an incomplete state, and she was moving from one dock to another under the orders of the harbourmaster, and the Court held that, although the anchor was not shackled and bent ready for dropping, an unfinished vessel such as the 'Springburn' was entitled to proceed from one dock to another without having her anchors ready for use. This case is quite different, because the 'City of Edinburgh' was loaded ready for sea and was going to another dock merely to take in bunker coals." her moorings in that dock, and caused damage to the extent, as agreed, of £1200. For this sum the pursuers seek decree against the defenders on the ground that the collision was caused by the fault of the defenders. It is quite settled that, when a collision occurs between two vessels, one of which is under way and the other stationary, the former is presumed to be in fault. The presumption, therefore, in this case is that the "City of Edinburgh" was in fault, and the defenders are prima facie liable for the damages sued for unless they can rebut the presumption. The first defence maintained is that the collision was caused by "inevitable accident." It is said that a sudden squall or gust of wind caught the "City of Edinburgh" just after she left her moorings, which drove her down upon the "Glassford." That defence, in my opinion, has not been established. I think it is proved that the wind on the morning and forenoon of the day in question was gusty. But it was not in character or intensity unusual, or such as could not and should not have been anticipated and provided against. The second defence is that the "City of Edinburgh" was, when the collision occurred, under the charge of a licensed pilot in waters where pilotage was compulsory. That is so, in point of fact. But it is not enough to exonerate the defenders to say that their vessel was under pilotage in compulsory waters. They must prove that the collision occurred through the fault of the pilot, and in this case the defenders do not even aver that the pilot was in fault, and their whole evidence is directed to shew that nobody was in fault. If they have not, as I think they have not, proved that the collision occurred through the fault of the pilot, their defence, based upon compulsory pilotage, fails—they have not rebutted the presumption against them.

The pursuers, however, have averred that the defenders were in fault by reason of their vessel not being duly equipped, in respect she had no anchors available for use in the event of their being required, and that the want of such equipment contributed to the collision. This leads the defenders to plead that, if the want of anchors contributed to the collision, such want was known to the pilot, and he was in fault in attempting to remove the defenders' vessel in her then condition. This fault on the part of the pilot is suggested or implied rather than averred. Whether the want of anchors contributed to the collision or not is a matter on which the proof cannot be said to be conclusive. I rather incline to the view of the Sheriff-substitute, that if there had been anchors, and these had been promptly used, the collision might have been avoided. But the want of anchors was the fault of the defenders, and the pilot cannot be said to be in fault in trying to shift the "City of Edinburgh" without them, because he was not consulted on that subject. He knew that the anchors were not available, because he saw a part of the windlass coming on board, but nothing was said to him on the subject. The chief officer of the "City of Edinburgh," who was in charge (for the captain was not on board), says "I never consulted with the pilot about it at all. He never spoke to me about the anchors, and I never spoke to him about them." This fact distinguishes the present case from the case of the "Assyria," where the defect in the trim of the vessel was brought under the direct notice of the pilot, and an offer made to remedy the defect, if he thought it advisable. The pilot in that case assumed the responsibility of navigating the vessel as she stood. Even if the pilot was in fault, in starting without available anchors, that would not absolve the defenders from liability. They had a duty as well as the pilot, that, namely, of having their vessel in navigable condition, and on the authority of the decision in the case of the "Iona"[1] (and it does not stand alone) I think the defenders' liability has been established on that ground. The additional ground of fault averred by the pursuers, that the tugs employed to shift the "City of Edinburgh" were not proper for the occasion, is, I think, not established. On the whole matter, my opinion is that the presumption of fault on the part of the defenders arising from the circumstance that the "Glassford" was stationary has not been rebutted, and that the defenders have failed to shew that the collision was occasioned through the fault of the pilot. I am, therefore, for dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD MONCREIFF, not having been present at the hearing, gave no opinion.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in terms of the findings in fact in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 8th July 1904, except the last two findings: Find further in fact (1) that the defenders have failed to prove that the collision in question was occasioned by any fault on the part of the pilot in charge of the defenders' vessel at the time of the collision; (2) that the said collision occurred through the fault of the defenders; and (3) that the damage occasioned by the collision to the pursuers' vessel amounts to the sum of £1200 sterling: Find in law that the defenders are liable to the pursuers for said sum: Therefore of new decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of said sum of £1200 sterling, with interest as concluded for."

MRS JANE GEMMELL OR WATSON, Pursuer.—Watt, K.C.—Munro. THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Guthrie, K.C.—Grierson.

Process—Jury Trial—Motion for new trial—Third Trial allowed—Contributory Negligence.—The pursuer in an action of damages for the death of her husband, who had been killed while checking waggons on railway sidings, obtained a verdict, which was set aside on the ground that contributory negligence on the part of the deceased had been proved. At the new trial the pursuer, upon the same evidence, again obtained a verdict.

The Court set aside the second verdict, and granted a third trial.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 4th August 1902 Richard Watson, a checker in the employment of a firm of shipping-agents in Bo'ness, while engaged at his work of checking waggons in the railway sidings at Bo'ness Docks, was run over and killed by an engine, which was shunting empty waggons. The railway sidings and the engine were the property of the North British Railway Company, and the engine-driver was their servant.

On 7th September 1902 Mrs Jane Gemmell or Watson, the widow

No. 41.

Watson v. North British Railway Co.

of Richard Watson, brought an action against the North British Railway Company for payment of £500 as damages for the death of her husband. The pursuer averred that her husband's death was due to the fault of the defenders or their servant, for whom they were responsible. In particular, she averred that no proper warning was given of the approach of the engine; that the engine was proceeding tender first; that the engine-driver was not keeping a proper lookout, and did not whistle; and that the defenders should have employed a "redcap" to walk in front of the engine.

The defenders averred that the engine-driver sounded his whistle, and took all usual and reasonable precautions, and that the accident was caused by the careless and reckless conduct of the deceased.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The accident to the pursuer's husband having been caused, or at least materially contributed to by his own fault or negligence, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

On 22d December 1903 the case was tried before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury on an issue in ordinary form, whether the deceased received injuries, in consequence of which he died, through the fault of the defenders.

The jury found for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £200.

The First Division set aside the verdict, and granted a new trial on the ground that the evidence shewed that the deceased had been guilty of contributory negligence by stepping on to the rails without looking to see whether a train was coming.

On 28th July 1904 the case was tried before the Lord President and a jury, when the jury again found for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £100.

The evidence led at the second trial was substantially the same as at the former trial, and sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

The defenders obtained a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted.

At the hearing on the rule, the pursuer argued;—The question was one of fact. Both juries had found on the facts that there was fault on the part of the defenders, and none on the part of the deceased. There was evidence to support both findings, and that being so, the Court would not order a third trial.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—It was not necessary to consider whether fault had been proved on the part of the defenders. The only question was whether it had been proved that the deceased had been guilty of contributory negligence. The Court were of opinion on the evidence led at the first trial that there had been contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, and the evidence led at the second trial was substantially the same. The fact that the deceased did not look to see whether a train was coming amounted to contributory negligence.[2] Where contributory negligence was proved the Court would grant a third trial.[3]

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have now heard this case fully argued, and as it was before us on a previous occasion it is unnecessary to enter into a detailed examination of the evidence, with which we are now very familiar. It appears to me that it is unnecessary to consider whether there was original fault on the part of the railway company,—for the purposes of the question it may be assumed that there was or may have been such fault.

But the really important question is whether there was contributory fault or negligence on the part of the deceased. We expressed our view as to this question on a previous occasion with reference to the evidence adduced at the first trial, and upon the evidence which was led before me at the last trial I can see no reason to doubt that the same conclusion should be arrived at upon this point. The place was thoroughly well known to the deceased; he was a checker, and was performing his duty of checking the waggons at the time when he was killed. He must have been perfectly familiar with the kind of shunting carried on at the place in question, and if he had paid due regard for his own safety he would have kept a look out for shunting trains so as to avoid them. It appears to me to have been sufficiently established that, if the deceased had used ordinary care in the performance of his duty the accident would not have occurred. He knew perfectly well that trains were likely to come along the line at any moment, and accordingly it was his duty to look out and see whether any train was coming before crossing or stepping upon the line. If a train had come along at a speed different from that which is commonly adopted in a shunting yard, or if waggons had suddenly come from a place from where they were not in the way of coming, or when he had no reason to expect them, I can quite understand that a case might be made out to the effect that he was surprised that something had occurred or had been done which he had no reason to expect. But according to the evidence, it seems that a train coming along that particular line was a thing which the deceased ought to have expected. Although not a railway servant he was for the purposes of this question in no different position from a railway servant, because when a person is carrying on work of which the nature, character, and risks are well known, it is his duty for his own safety to be vigilant and to see that he does not place himself in a position where he may be run down. Although in the general case one feels a great disposition to support a second verdict, and not to give a new trial, still if it is clear, as it is here, that an erroneous view has been taken by the jury, then it seems to me that it is our duty to prevent an injustice being done. Accordingly I think we should set aside this verdict and grant a new trial.

LORD ADAM.—As I understand Mr Guthrie's argument, he did not raise the question whether any original fault had been made out at all, but rested his case, as he did on the former occasion, entirely on the question of the existence of contributory negligence on the part of the injured man. When we disposed of this case before we did so on the ground that the evidence led at the first trial disclosed a case of contributory negligence. Mr Watt now says that in the new trial there was fresh evidence led, which displaces that conclusion. He says that on the former occasion the case was disposed of on the ground that there was no evidence that this unfortunate man ever looked round to see if it was safe for him to cross the rails, while in the new case there is evidence to this effect at least, that his head was turned towards the west, and from that he asks us to draw the inference that he did look to see if any trains were coming. I do not think this additional piece of evidence makes any difference. The material question really is at what distance can a train approaching be seen from that point, and though I think there was some contradiction among the men who spoke about five yards, there was satisfactory evidence that it could be seen at from forty to fifty yards. From that it is clear that if he had looked he could not have failed to see the train coming in ample time, and I cannot think that the new evidence now referred to makes any difference to that conclusion. On the former occasion I felt that a case of contributory negligence had been made out, and here I must again come to the same conclusion, and that being so, I feel constrained, in spite of the inconvenience of ordering a third trial, to give my opinion that this verdict cannot stand.

No. 41.

Watson v. North British Railway Co.

LORD M'LAREN.—The Court granted a new trial when we last had occasion to review the evidence. The pursuer has gone to trial and, so far as I am able to judge, the evidence in the second trial is an exact repetition of the evidence in the first. Of course there are variations, because people will not repeat the same story in the same words at an interval of a year. But in my judgment there are no such differences as would amount to a material variation of the conditions of this question of fact. It follows that as the pursuer has not strengthened her case in any way, the defenders are entitled to have the verdict set aside. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that in a case of this kind the Court has not the power, or at least has not exercised the power, of directing a verdict to be entered for the defender, but it seems to me that a trial conscientiously conducted on the part of the jury can only lead to one result, that pointed out by your Lordships who have spoken. It is unnecessary to consider whether there was any fault on the part of the engineman in the speed or as to the signalling, because every man who uses a road is bound to take precautions for his own safety. When I say bound, I mean that it is a moral duty, and is one which must be discharged as a condition of any claim which may be against a third party. Now, if the deceased had looked in the direction from which the train was coming, he would have seen the train and would either not have attempted to cross the line in advance of the train, or if he made the attempt and was run over, that would be an error of judgment on his part for which he, and not the Railway Company, would be responsible. Unwilling as we are to continue the re-trial of cases indefinitely, I agree with your Lordship that we have no alternative but to set aside this verdict.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT set aside the verdict and granted a new trial.

SIR CHARLES BOWMAN LOGAN AND OTHERS (William Anderson's Trustees), First Parties.—Campbell, K.C.—Munro.
MRS ANNIE ELIZABETH BOYD BURNETT OR ANDERSON AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Campbell, K.C.—Munro.
DAVID BROWN ANDERSON, Third Party.—Sol.-Gen. Dundas—Blackburn.

Succession—Vesting—Fee or Liferent—Right to payment—Repugnancy.—A testator by the third purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into four equal shares, "which several shares shall continue to be held by my said trustees, or paid, applied, or disposed of by them in manner hereinafter directed." In the fifth purpose the testator directed the trustees to hold and invest in their own names one share for behoof of his second son. The trustees were further directed to pay to the son during his survivance the free income of the share, with power to them to make advances, not exceeding £2000, out of capital "in the event of the marriage of my said son to the satisfaction of my said trustees, or if for any other reason they may judge it expedient and prudent to make such advances." Power was also given to the son to provide, with consent of the trustees, an annuity for his widow out of the income of the share, and to apportion "by deed, inter vivos, or by testament, to take effect upon his decease," the share among his children. The testator further provided that in the event of the son "dying unmarried" the share should "be divided equally among his surviving nearest of kin per stirpes."

The son survived the testator, and married and obtained an advance of £2000 from the trustees.

In a special case the son maintained that he was entitled to payment of the share.

Held that the son was not entitled to payment, and that the trustees were bound to hold the share for his behoof during his lifetime.

1ST DIVISION. WILLIAM ANDERSON, of Hallyards, Peebles, died on 3d March 1879, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 19th January 1877, by which he conveyed his whole estate to Sir Charles Bowman Logan and others in trust for certain purposes.

By the fifth purpose the testator directed his trustees to hold one-fourth of the residue for behoof of his second son David Brown Anderson, with further directions hereinafter quoted. The second son David Brown Anderson having claimed payment of his share from the trustees on the ground that by the deed a right of fee had been conferred upon him, a special case was presented to the Court.

The parties to the special case were (first) the trustees acting under the testator's settlement; (second) Mrs Annie E. Burnett or Anderson and others, the widow and children of the testator's elder son, and also Mrs Harriet Cassels Anderson or Cassels and Miss Adamina Anderson, the testator's two daughters; and (third) the testator's younger son David Brown Anderson.

The only question of law dealt with by the Court was:—"Are the first parties bound to continue to hold, during the lifetime of the third party, the share of the testator's estate at present held by them for his behoof; or is he entitled to receive payment of the same now?"

The following trust purposes were referred to:—"(Third) I direct that the whole free residue and remainder of my said estate . . . shall, as soon as conveniently may be after my death, be divided by my said trustees into four just and equal shares, corresponding to the number of my present surviving children, which several shares shall continue to be held by my said trustees, or paid, applied, or disposed of by them in manner hereinafter directed. (Fourth) I direct my said trustees, as soon as conveniently may be after the foresaid division, to pay, assign, or dispone one of said just and equal fourth shares to my elder son William Anderson. . . . (Fifth) I direct my said trustees to hold another of said just and equal fourth shares of said residue for behoof of my younger son David Brown Anderson, Writer to the Signet, and they shall cause the amount thereof to be transferred to and invested in their own names for his behoof, and they shall pay over to him during his survivance the free interest, dividends, or annual profits thence arising, and his receipt therefor shall be a valid and effectual discharge to my said trustees for the payments of said interest, dividends, or profits: But with power to said trustees (in the event of the marriage of my said son to the satisfaction of my said trustees, or if for any other reason they may judge it expedient and prudent to make such advances) to advance to him from the capital of said share held by them for his behoof a sum or sums not exceeding in whole the sum of £2000 sterling to meet expenses needful and proper to be incurred upon his marriage, or for the other purposes above referred to: With power also to my said son to make, with consent of the said trustees, provision for a suitable annuity or jointure for his widow out of the income of said share, and also in the event of there being children procreated of his said marriage to convey, assign, or bequeath by deed, inter vivos, or by testament, to take effect upon his decease, said share of my said means and estate in such proportions amongst said children as he may judge proper, and in the event of the said David Brown Anderson dying unmarried the said fourth share held for his behoof as aforesaid, or the proceeds thereof, shall in so far as the same may not have been advanced to him as aforesaid, be divided equally among his surviving nearest of kin per stirpes. (Sixth) I direct my said trustees to hold another of said just and equal fourth shares for behoof of my elder daughter . . . in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and the children of her said late or any future marriage in fee; . . . and upon the decease of my said daughter . . . my said trustees shall make payment to the child or children lawfully procreated of her body of said share . . . and that in such proportions and at such terms as my said daughter shall appoint by a writing under her hand, either testamentary or inter vivos. . . ." The seventh purpose contained a bequest of the remaining share to his younger daughter for her liferent use allenarly and her children in fee in terms similar to those of the sixth purpose.

The residue of the testator's estate amounted to £90,000.

David Brown Anderson was married in 1900, and, with the consent of the trustees, provided, by postnuptial contract, a jointure to his wife out of the income of the share held for him. The trustees, in virtue of the power conferred upon them, advanced to David Brown Anderson the sum of £2000.

At the date of the special case, David Brown Anderson's wife was alive, and there were no children of the marriage.

The first and second parties maintained that the first parties were bound to hold the third party's share of said residue during his survivance in terms of the testator's settlement.

David Brown Anderson, the third party, maintained that the share of residue held by the first parties for his behoof vested in him a morte testatoris, subject to defeasance in the event of his dying unmarried, which was the only case in which an ulterior right was conferred on his next of kin, and that, as that event could not now occur, the share had vested in him absolutely, and he was entitled to payment thereof.

Argued for the first and second parties;—No vested right of fee entitling to immediate payment had been conferred by the testator upon his son, David Brown Anderson.[1] Muir's Trustees[1] was an authority directly in point. The direction "to hold for behoof of" must be read in conjunction with the whole clause. There was here no direction to pay the capital of the share to David Brown Anderson, but merely a direction to pay the income, and there was a destination over to his nearest of kin per stirpes in the event of his dying unmarried. The words, "dying unmarried," meant "dying without leaving a widow." The terms of the bequest to David Brown Anderson were in striking contrast to the language used by the testator in giving an undoubted fee to his elder son, and much more nearly resembled the clauses giving a liferent to his daughters. It was admitted that where a fee had been given its enjoyment could not be restricted;[2] but a fee might be given subject to restriction in a certain event, with a direction to the trustees to hold until it was seen whether or not the event occurred.[3] Again, trustees were bound to hold, where it was necessary that they should do so, in order to carry out the purposes of the trust.[4] Greenlees' Trustees[5] and Ballantyne's Trustees[6] were cases of repugnancy, where an undoubted fee was given, and the latter case was of doubtful authority since the dicta in Bowman.[7]

Argued for the third party;—David Brown Anderson was entitled to payment of his share. A direction "to hold for behoof of" was equivalent to a gift in fee,[8] and subsequent restrictions could not stand along with a gift in fee.[9] The power to make advances pointed to a vested fee. The testator had given a liferent to his daughters in clear language, but the bequest to the third party was in very different terms. The only necessity for the trustees to hold the fund was the contingency of David Brown Anderson dying unmarried, but that contingency had been purged by his marriage with their consent. "Dying unmarried" meant dying without ever having been married.[10]

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1904.
Anderson's Trustees v. Anderson.

It had been held that a widower was a "married man,"[1] and the words "dying without issue" had been construed as meaning "without ever having had issue."[2]

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case arises out of the trust-disposition and settlement left by the late Mr William Anderson of Hallyards. Mr Anderson left a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he appointed certain trustees. He also left two sons and two daughters. The parties to this case are, the trustees appointed by Mr Anderson, of the first part; the two daughters, of the second part; and Mr David Brown Anderson, who is the younger son of the testator, of the third part.

The question arises out of the clause by which the testator directs the disposal of the residue of his estate; and that question is whether Mr David Brown Anderson, the party of the third part, has on the proper construction of the settlement, and more especially of the fifth clause of the settlement, an absolute right to the fee of the share bequeathed to him, and if he has such a right of fee whether or not he has right to immediate payment. The first parties, the trustees, say that that is not the nature of the right given to Mr David Brown Anderson, but that what is given to him is only a liferent, and certain other advantages or powers which it is in the option of the trustees to confer upon him.

Now, in the clause dealing with residue the testator directs that the whole of the residue and remainder of his estate "shall as soon as conveniently may be after my death, be divided by my said trustees into four just and equal shares, corresponding to the number of my present surviving children, which several shares shall continue to be held by my said trustees or paid, applied, or disposed of by them, in manner hereinafter directed." That is the ruling clause as to the residue. It is to be divided by the trustees into four shares, and these shares are to be held or paid according to the manner he directs. That is to say, some are to be paid, some are to be held; and accordingly in the next clause, which deals with the share given to his eldest son, there is a direction "as soon as conveniently may be after the foresaid division, to pay, assign, or dispone one of said just and equal four shares to" his elder son, William Anderson. Now there is no question that that clause confers a fee upon William Anderson. But then we come to the fifth clause, which is the one we have materially to do with; and by it he directs his trustees "to hold another of said just and equal fourth shares of said residue for behoof of my younger son, David Brown Anderson, Writer to the Signet." The direction there is not to pay but to "hold for behoof of."

It was said by the Solicitor-General, and I do not dispute the observation, that a direction simply to hold for behoof of a particular person with no further direction or with no further limitations or qualifications, and no further disposition of the fee, would and may in certain cases amount to a gift, though it is only said to be "for behoof of." I do not dispute that at all, but I dispute altogether the mode of construction of this clause, which the learned Solicitor-General submitted, namely, that having got the leading words "to hold one-fourth of the residue for behoof of my younger son, David Brown Anderson," we have to stop there and say—without looking at the qualifications and limitations contained in the clause—that that means an absolute gift in this case, and that being an absolute gift, all the qualifications and conditions annexed to it are to be considered as mere qualifications and conditions of an absolute gift already given. I do not think that is a proper mode of construing a will. I think you must take the whole clause from first to last, and having considered the whole clause with all its conditions and qualifications, then say whether, when the testator used the words that the trustees were to hold one-fourth share for behoof of David Brown Anderson, he thereby meant them to hold it for his behoof in fee, or to hold it for his behoof as subsequently directed and pointed out in the clause. Now, if that be the proper way to consider the case, the question is, looking to the construction of this will, what was the intention of the testator? Was the intention, taking the whole clause into consideration, to confer an absolute fee on his son, David Brown Anderson, or was it to give him the life interest and other powers thereby conferred, and no more?

The testator further goes on to direct that the trustees are to take and invest his share in their names for his behoof, and then this is what they are to do,—"They shall pay over to him during his survivance the free interest, dividend, or annual profits thence arising, and his receipt therefor shall be a valid and effectual discharge to my said trustees for the payments of said interest, dividends, or profits." That is nothing but a direction to pay the interest or income of the estate. It was said that that is inconsistent with a direct right of fee being given to Mr Anderson, because, if so, he had a right to demand the whole capital, and the direction to pay the interest would be quite superfluous.

But then there is another power to the trustees. In the event of the marriage of the son to their satisfaction, "or if for any other reason they may judge it expedient and prudent to make such advances," they have power to advance to him from the capital of the share held by them for his behoof a sum not exceeding £2000 sterling to meet expenses needful and proper to be incurred upon his marriage. Now, that again is entirely inconsistent with his having a right to the whole capital. It is provided that his share is to be held for his behoof in the sense expressed here—that the trustees, if they think proper, may advance £2000.

Then there is a power given to the son to provide, with the consent of the trustees, for his widow in the event of his marriage. The same observation applies to this provision. That is not an absolute power of disposal of the estate, and is inconsistent with the fee being intended to be given. Then there is the power of apportioning his share among his own children; but that is a very different power from a power of absolute disposal to anybody he wished. It is a limited power, and again is inconsistent with the right in fee being given to him.

And then we have another clause which is, that in the event of Mr David Brown Anderson dying unmarried, the one-fourth share held for his behoof, or the proceeds thereof, shall be divided "equally among his surviving nearest of kin per stirpes." Now, it is impossible to deny that on the construction of that clause in certain events there was an equal division of the fee to be given to selected beneficiaries, namely, not the heirs in mobilibus, which the law would settle, but his nearest of kin per stirpes, which is a selected class.

As to the true meaning of the word "unmarried," whether it means if he should die unmarried, or whether it means if he should never have been married, on the construction of this deed, I do not think it is at all material what meaning we give the word, because we are trying to find the intention of the testator, and it appears to me quite obvious that in certain events contemplated by the testator the fee of this estate was not given to his son, but was given to his next of kin per stirpes. That is a clear destination-over, and is quite inconsistent with David Brown Anderson having a right of fee a morte testatoris. Accordingly, on the construction of this deed, I think it is evident that the intention of the testator was not to give the fee to David Brown Anderson, but to give the trustees the duty to hold and to administer the estate in terms of the fifth clause. I am therefore of opinion that we should answer in the affirmative the first alternative of the first question, to the effect that the first parties are bound to hold during the lifetime of the third party the share of the testator's estate at present held by them for his behoof.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question relates to the construction of the fifth purpose of Mr Anderson's will under which he deals with the interest of one of his sons. I think it proper to begin by attending to the terms of the third purpose in which the testator indicates the general scheme of his settlement, which is that his whole estate is to be divided by his trustees "into four just and equal shares corresponding to the number of my present surviving children," but then he proceeds, "which four shares shall continue to be held by my said trustees, or paid, applied, or disposed of by them in manner hereinafter directed." Here, I think, is a plain announcement that although his estate is to be divided into four shares, the testator does not intend that each of these four shares shall be dealt with in the same manner, but that you are to look to the special direction to see in what way the general intention in favour of each member of his family is to be carried out.

Now, with the aid of the prefatory statement in the third purpose I think no one who goes on to read the fifth purpose, in which the trustees are directed to hold a certain "share for behoof of" the testator's younger son, David Brown Anderson, could fall into the error of supposing these words stated completely the purpose of the testator in regard to his son, but would consider that these words are merely an announcement of the subject which he was going to dispose of, and would look for the precise destination of that share to the directions which are given to the trustees in regard to this share which they are to set apart for behoof of David Brown Anderson. It was contended by the third parties that these words "for behoof of my younger son" are sufficient to vest him in the capital of his share in the events which have happened; but there are at least two perfectly legitimate modes of interpreting these general words. The one would be that the son would get just the particular interest thereafter provided for him, and no more; and the other would be that he is to get all the particular benefit provided for him, but if there be any case unprovided for, then this general intention would take effect in his favour. Now, when we look to the language of the fifth purpose to see which of these constructions of the general language at the beginning is the true one, I can have no doubt that the testator intended to qualify the bequest, because at the very beginning the testator's first direction is to pay Mr David Brown Anderson the income of the share. That would be a very strange way of carrying out a purpose to give the legatee the capital. In so far as the argument of the third parties is founded on the cases of Miller's Trustees[1] and Yuill,[2] I think it proceeds on a misapprehension of the scope of the rule of construction there introduced, because these cases had only reference to administration, and all that was laid down was that if from the language of the deed it is clear that a fee is given, any attempt to limit the enjoyment of the fee would be futile. But then that principle is qualified in the opinion of Lord President Inglis by saying that when there are trust purposes to be served which cannot be secured except by continuing the trust administration, the rule cannot be applied, and the qualification stated in that eminent Judge's decision is confirmed by the decision of the House of Lords in Macculloch,[3] where, while the principle of Miller's Trustees[1] and Yuill[2] was affirmed, it was held that the principle could not be applied to the case of a son in whom the right of fee had vested, because the son was not entitled, in face of the opposition of the daughters, to insist upon an immediate division of the estate. I do not doubt that, if all parties were agreed, the estate might be divided, but even in the matter of administration any of the beneficiaries who desired that the estate should be administered by the trustees would according to the case of Macculloch[3] be entitled to have the trust kept up. But then the case of the third party is further put upon the ground that while a liferent is in the first place given to Mr Anderson, there are superadded such extensive interests in the fee that when combined with the liferent, they constitute the equivalent of an unqualified fee. Now, as I had occasion to point out in a case which was discussed last week,[4] although the doctrine has been laid down by the highest authorities that a liferent with an unqualified power of disposal and no ulterior destination may amount to a fee, no case has actually occurred in which all these theoretical conditions have been fulfilled, and in which by the mere force of the words themselves a qualified right has been held to be an unqualified right. It is not surprising that there should be no such case, because if a testator means to give an unqualified right it is very easy for him to say so, and if he means substantial qualification then such qualifications would receive effect through the intervention of a trust. Now, it seems to me that under this trust Mr Anderson has an absolute right to nothing more than the sum of £2000 which the trustees are empowered to advance to him, and with regard to all the rest of the capital the directions are perfectly plain that Mr Anderson is to receive the income for life, and that the fee is to go to his children if he marries, subject to a power of division amongst them to be exercised by will or deed.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1904. Anderson's Trustees v. Anderson.

What is to happen in case Mr Anderson should have no issue, or should die without leaving any children surviving him, is a question which I think we can hardly usefully consider at the present time. It may be that if in that case he disposed of the estate to third parties, it might be held that under the general words at the commencemeut of the fifth purpose he would have an interest in the fee sufficient to enable him to dispose of it. That has been held in other cases, chiefly cases of provisions in favour of ladies, with a power to settle; but this is a question which we are unable to determine in the absence of those who may have an adverse interest.

I am clearly of opinion with your Lordship that the testamentary directions must be carried out according to the plain meaning of the language used, and that this is not a case where any artificial or arbitrary rule of construction ought to interfere with the testator's intention, and that the question must be answered in favour of the first parties.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships, for the reasons you have stated.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Appeal—Interim Execution pending appeal—Expenses—Modification—48 Geo. III. cap. 151, sec. 17.—In an action of damages for breach of contract the pursuer was found entitled to damages and to expenses, "reserving consideration as to modification" until the approval of the Auditor's report. After the expenses had been taxed, but before the Auditor's report had come up for approval, the defenders appealed to the House of Lords. In a petition presented by the pursuer for interim execution pending the appeal, including interim execution for the taxed expenses, the Court refused the petition quoad the expenses, in respect that after the appeal had been presented it was incompetent to deal with the question of modification of the expenses.

(SEE Williamson v. Macpherson & Co., June 28, 1904, 6 F. 863.) 2D DIVISION.

In this action John Williamson, shipowner, Glasgow, concluded against Alexander Macpherson & Company, contractors for ship machinery, Greenock, for £1100, as damages for breach of contract.

On 13th January 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) granted decree in favour of the pursuer, assessing the damages at £243, 9s. 9d., with a finding as to expenses in the following terms:—"Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, reserving consideration as to modification; allows an account of said expenses to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the Auditor of Court to tax and to report."

The defenders reclaimed.

On 28th June 1904 the Second Division adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, with a finding as to expenses in the following terms:—"Find the pursuer entitled to additional expenses; remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report to the Lord Ordinary, to whom remit the cause to proceed therein, and to decern for said expenses."

The pursuer's account of expenses was thereafter taxed at £1299, 6s. 4d., but before the Auditor's report was approved the defenders on 8th November 1904 presented a petition and appeal to the House of Lords.

On 8th December the pursuer petitioned for interim execution pending appeal, praying the Court "to allow execution to proceed on the said judgments and decrees of dates 13th January 1904 and 28th June 1904 before mentioned, notwithstanding the said appeal, to the effect of enabling the petitioner to recover payment of the sums thereby found due to him, as well as the taxed expenses before mentioned and dues of extract . . . and, if necessary for that purpose, of new to remit to the Lord Ordinary to decern for the taxed expenses found due to the petitioner."

The defenders, in the Single Bills, objected to the petition being granted in so far as it related to expenses, and argued;—After an appeal had been taken to the House of Lords the process was no longer in the Court of Session, and it was consequently not possible for the Lord Ordinary to deal with the question of modification which had been reserved.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—The proper course was to remit to the Lord Ordinary to deal with the question of modification, reserved by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and that course was competent notwithstanding the appeal.[2] The cases on which the defenders founded were too remote in date to throw light on the existing practice.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the prayer of the petition should be granted so far as it refers to the sums found due, and refused quoad ultra.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I see no reason for departing from the practice established by the cases cited to us.

LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the prayer of the petition so far as it related to the sums found due to the petitioner, and quoad ultra refused the prayer.

the price, and for the completion of a purchaser's title, by recording in the Register of Sasines a decree of the Sheriff declaring the purchase duly completed, and authorising immediate possession of the tenements sold.

Ruinous buildings sold under the above enactment were situate on ground let on a building lease for 999 years. After the purchaser had completed his title by recording the Sheriff's decree and had disponed the subjects, an action was raised against the disponee for payment of rent due under the long lease, the pursuer contending that the purchaser had acquired the property tantum et tale as it stood in the lessee. The defender founded on the recorded decree as giving him an unqualified statutory title to the land.

The Court sustained the defence.

1ST DIVISION.

Sheriff of Ayrshire.

IN 1903, certain ruinous buildings in Cauldshore, Girvan, of which the owner was not known, were sold by the Commissioners of the Burgh of Girvan by public roup by order of the Sheriff, and the price deposited in bank, in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sections 200 and 196.*

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), section 195, in dealing with ruinous buildings belonging to two or more owners, gives the parties interested an option of purchase or sale among themselves upon a valuation made by order of the Sheriff, and enacts:—Section 196. "If any of the said parties fail to take advantage of the said option within the time so fixed, or shall not be able to agree as to which shall be the buyer and which the seller, it shall be lawful to the said Sheriff to cause such houses, buildings, and areas to be exposed to sale by public auction, . . . and the purchaser thereof shall be then bound within ten days after the sale, or within such time as may be fixed by the Sheriff, to consign the purchase money, . . . and the money so deposited shall remain at interest for the behoof of all parties interested therein, and subject to the future orders of the Sheriff."

Section 197. "Upon such deposit being so made, the Sheriff shall pronounce his decree or warrant, declaring the purchase duly completed, and authorising immediate possession of the tenements so sold to be given to the purchaser thereof; and such warrant or decree shall, upon being registered in the proper Register of Sasines, be a valid and sufficient title to such purchaser."

Section 200. "If any houses, buildings, or areas have become waste and ruinous, or have become receptacles for filth and other nuisances, or unsafe and unfit for use and occupation, the Commissioners may, by a notice addressed to the owner if his address shall be known, or if not known by a notice affixed to a conspicuous part of such houses, buildings, or areas, require the same to be rebuilt or otherwise put into a state of repair to their satisfaction, within three months from the date of such notice; and in the event of such requisition not being complied with, the Commissioners may apply to the Sheriff for warrant to sell such houses, buildings, or areas, and it shall be lawful to the Sheriff to order the same to be valued and exposed for sale by public auction, and to sell the same, and such sale shall be made and carried out, or re-sale effected, the price deposited and applied, and the purchaser's title completed, in the way and manner hereinbefore directed with reference to waste and ruinous buildings, houses, or areas within burgh, held by two or more joint owners."

Section 4 (22). "'Owner' shall include joint owner, fiar, liferenter, feuar, or other persons in the actual possession of, or entitled to receive, the rents of lands and premises of every tenure and description, and the factor, agent, or commissioner of such person, or any of them, or any other person, who shall intromit with or draw the rents."

The purchaser of the buildings was Robert Wotherspoon.

On 22d January 1903 the Sheriff of Ayrshire pronounced an interlocutor approving of the report of the sale to Wotherspoon at the price of £116, "and in respect that deposit of said price has been made by the said Robert Wotherspoon, declares the purchase duly completed, and authorises immediate possession of said houses or buildings so sold to be given to the said Robert Wotherspoon, the purchaser thereof."

On 16th February 1903, Wotherspoon registered an extract of the Sheriff's decree in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Ayr.

On 26th November 1903, Wotherspoon disponed the buildings in question to Dr John Grainger, Glasgow, and the disposition was recorded in the Register of Sasines on the following day.

On 31st March 1904 Mrs Mary Isobel Murdoch or Young and others, the testamentary trustees of the late John George Kirkpatrick Young, of Glendoune, Girvan, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire at Ayr against Dr John Grainger, for payment of £1, 1s. 11½d., being the one year's rent due at Martinmas 1903 for the ground upon which the buildings conveyed to him by Wotherspoon were erected.

The pursuers averred that the ground in question formed part of a large area of ground included in a long lease granted by Thomas Francis Kennedy of Dunure, their author, in favour of John Mackenzie, manufacturer in Doune, Girvan, dated 25th December 1836, and 7th December 1839, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 12th May 1894; that the lease was for the period of 999 years from Martinmas 1832, as to some portions of the ground, and from Martinmas 1834 as regards another portion of the ground; that the portion of the cumulo yearly rent of £4, 7s. 9d. applicable to the subjects possessed by the defender was £1, 1s. 11½d., and that this sum was regularly paid to the pursuers by Hugh M'Ghie, a grandson of the said John Mackenzie, who had acquired right under the lease to the ground in question, up to Martinmas 1902.

The pursuers further averred (Cond. 5) that Robert Wotherspoon had acquired Hugh M'Ghie's rights to the lease in virtue of the decree of the Sheriff of Ayrshire above narrated. "The process upon which said decree followed is referred to and founded on. The pursuers were not called as defenders therein. They were not parties to it. They received no notice of the proceedings. Subsequently the said Robert Wotherspoon conveyed to the defender the said rights of the said Hugh M'Ghie, so acquired under said decree, conform to the disposition produced by the defender. The defender is now in right of the said Hugh M'Ghie's rights of said lease to the extent of the said ground . . ." (Cond. 7) "The capital value of the subject of the action exceeds £25."

The defender founded upon his disposition from Wotherspoon, and the decree of the Sheriff of Ayrshire in Wotherspoon's favour above set forth.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender being in right of said lease, and in possession of the ground, to the extent condescended on, he is bound to pay the yearly rent applicable thereto to the pursuer, the ground landlord in said lease. (3) The defender having under said decree only acquired the lessee's interest in said ground, the pursuer's claim is not excluded.

Young's Trustees v. Grainger.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender being absolute proprietor of the subjects in question in virtue of a statutory title, and a decree of Court, the pursuer's claim is excluded, and is incompetent, and the action should be dismissed, with expenses.

No question was raised with regard to the regularity of the procedure relating to the sale of the buildings in question to Wotherspoon.

On 14th June 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Shairp) sustained the third plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—It was not disputed that the ground on which the buildings were erected was part of the ground let under the long lease, which had been registered in the Register of Sasines. The nature of the legal rights created by a long lease had at first been doubted,[1] but in Fraser v. His Majesty's Advocate[2] a long lease upon which sasine and possession had followed, was held good against the granter and against the Crown, and the right had come to be assimilated to that of a feu-contract.[3] Any doubt as to the nature of the right had been removed by the Registration of Leases Act, 1857.[4] Accordingly, all the Sheriff could sell was the leasehold subjects, and his decree only gave the purchaser a title to these subjects tantum et tale as they stood in the previous owner. The lessor was not "the owner" of the property.[5] He received no notice, and had no right or duty to repair the buildings. He could not therefore prevent the sale, nor could he claim against the price, because it was the interest of the "owner" which was sold, and the deposited money belonged to the owner or his representatives. The result of the Sheriff's judgment was to create a new estate in land, and to wipe out the right of the ground landlord.

Argued for the defender;—The procedure leading up to the Sheriff's decree was admittedly regular, and the provisions of the Act of 1892, with regard to the effect of that decree, were perfectly clear and distinct. The Sheriff's decree gave the purchaser an absolute and unqualified title. The pursuer's remedy was to claim against the price.

LORD ADAM.—This is an appeal from the Sheriff Court at Ayr, in which the pursuers claim a right to rent as lessors under a long lease granted by Mr Kennedy, their predecessor, and which has been duly recorded. The sum which the appellants seek to recover is a small sum of £1, 1s. 11½d., being the proportion of the total rent of the original subjects effeiring to the portion in the defender's possession, but it has been pointed out that this is a continuing payment, and is of sufficient value to entitle the pursuers to appeal to the Court of Session. The defender says, in defence to the action, that he has nothing to do with the long lease, and that he is proprietor of the subjects, and is therefore not due rent. The question, therefore, is whether this defence is well founded, and whether the defender is, in fact, not tenant, but proprietor. The title which the defender produces is an extract decree in a petition in the Sheriff Court at Ayr, which sets forth—[His Lordship quoted the extract decree]; and that decree has been duly registered in the Register of Sasines. The appellants do not attack the decree, but they say, esto that the decree is good, still the effect of it is not to relieve the purchaser from the obligation to pay rent under the long lease. The decree proceeds under section 200 of the Burgh Police Act, 1902, and it is not disputed that the proceedings have been properly carried out. That section deals with ruinous and insanitary buildings, and it is not disputed that this was the condition of the buildings in question. With regard to such buildings, the section enacts that the Commissioners may, if the address of the owner is not known, by a notice affixed to the buildings, require them to be put in proper repair within three months, and may, if the requisition is not complied with, apply to the Sheriff for a warrant to sell the buildings, and thereafter carry out the sale. In this case the Commissioners did not know the owner of these derelict buildings, with the result that, after three months, no one came forward to say that he would remove the nuisance, and the buildings were sold under the warrant of the Sheriff, and the price duly consigned to await the claim of anyone having an interest in the buildings. With regard to the purchaser's title, section 197 enacts that the Sheriff's decree, declaring the purchase duly completed, shall, upon being registered in the proper Register of Sasines, be a valid and sufficient title. The section does not say that the purchaser is to be the assignee to a lease or the vassal of a superior, but that the decree shall be a valid and sufficient title to such purchaser; and I am of opinion that, on a proper construction of the Act, the purchaser here is not the tenant, but is the proprietor of the buildings. That is my short view of the case. The result may be anomalous, as the property would be held under no superior, but it is not new, e.g., we have the purchase of lands by railway companies or by school boards. On the whole matter, it appears to me that the provisions of the statute have been properly carried out, and that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dismissing the action is right.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have not found this case very easy of solution, but I shall state the considerations hinc inde which have affected my mind. Section 200, in connection with previous sections, relates to ruinous and insanitary property. Under section 200, with which we are more directly concerned, the first proceeding is that the burgh authorities may issue an order requiring the owner to put the property in repair to their satisfaction. If the owner cannot be found, sufficient intimation may be given by a notice affixed to the building. If that order is not implemented, the burgh authority may then proceed to sell the property under a warrant to be issued by the Sheriff. The definition of "owner" in section 4 (22) does not throw much light upon the question, but it may at least be said that, if there is a hierarchy of owners in the feudal sense, the definition includes the person who draws the rent payable by the occupier, and it can hardly be disputed that the tenant under a long lease is the owner to whom notice has to be given. To my mind, the difficulty of including the superior or owner of the ground rent, who has the dominium of the lands, is that a person in that position has neither a right nor a duty to repair the buildings, because he has parted with the proceeds of the subjects in exchange for an annual payment. I cannot think that it is a sound construction of the statute to hold that the pursuers were in fault for not having obeyed an order which it was not in their power to fulfil, and the result arrived at by the Sheriff must be supported upon some other ground. Section 200 contemplates the case of a ruinous tenement in a burgh the owner of which is unknown. If it were made a condition of the sale that rights to ground rents are reserved, it might be difficult to find a purchaser, and the clause would be inadequate for its purpose. I am not satisfied that this is a good answer, or that it was intended to confiscate the rights of a superior or owner of a ground-annual. But while I feel the force of this difficulty I am not inclined to dissent; indeed, I am reconciled to the decision which your Lordship proposes for two reasons. First, because the statute makes the right to rent a preferential claim upon the price; and second, because this is the only way in which the clause can be effectively worked. The effect of these proceedings is to confer a valid and unimpeachable title upon the purchaser, and any person who can shew an interest must claim against the purchase price.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, and substantially on the grounds stated by your Lordships. The action is raised by a landlord for payment of rent due under a long lease, and he has brought it, very naturally, against the person whom he finds in possession of the premises. The defender puts forward as his defence that he is not a tenant holding under the lease, nor does his title proceed from anyone who was in right of the lease, but that he holds an absolute title based on a decree of the Sheriff—a title quite independent of any rights or obligations under the lease. I think, if that is made out, it is a perfectly good answer to the demand for payment of rent.

In considering the title of the defender, it is necessary to observe the object of the power under which the burgh authorities sold these premises. The object is to abate a nuisance arising from houses that have become waste and ruinous, or receptacles for filth, or unsafe and unfit for use. With regard to such property the burgh authorities may give notice, individual or public as the case may be, calling for its repair, and if this order is not complied with, they may then apply to the Sheriff for an order to sell the property. The object of the power therefore is to provide a practical method of abating a nuisance by selling derelict buildings if the owner fails to put them in repair. When the purchaser has consigned the purchase money in bank, subject to the orders of the Sheriff, the Sheriff will pronounce a decree declaring the purchase completed and authorising immediate possession, and the statute further provides that such decree upon being registered shall be "a valid and sufficient title to such purchaser." Now, that seems to me to be a perfectly clear provision that this decree is to be in itself a sufficient title, and that the purchaser is not bound to connect it with any previous title in order to make it effectual. If it had been intended that he should make up a title by transmission, it would have been perfectly easy to make that clear. If the Act had said that the Sheriff's decree was to be equivalent to a conveyance from the last proprietor, we might have understood that the purchaser was intended to take the property subject to all the previous burdens upon it. Failing such a provision, I cannot see that he is bound to connect with any previous owner, and I think that we must give effect to the precise words of the statute.

It is true that this provision of the statute introduces two somewhat startling anomalies into our law of conveyancing, for, in the first place, it gives a purchaser a title without connecting his holding with that of any predecessor in the subjects, and, secondly, it gives him a right to hold heritable property on a title independent of any known feudal tenure. But these anomalies are not unprecedented, for as we all know there are other cases of statutory titles which are perfectly good, independently of any feudal title whatever. But whether unprecedented or not, we must give effect to the plain words of the statute.

But another point has been urged by the appellants against the view taken by the Sheriff, namely, that it will have the effect of extinguishing rights which were in existence at the time of the sale, and that without giving notice to the owner of these rights, so as to enable him to step in and prevent the sale by himself taking steps to abate the nuisance. I think that is exactly the result which is contemplated by the provisions of the statute. But it is said that the effect will be a confiscation of the rights of the landlord. I cannot agree with that view. The only prejudicial result of these proceedings will be that they will have the effect of a compulsory conversion of heritable property into money. The terms of the clause shew that the statute contemplates that there will always be someone with such an interest in the property that he can or may put it in repair and so abate the nuisance, and if such a person can be found he is to get notice. But if no such person can be found, a requisition is to be affixed to the buildings themselves, so that anyone with an interest in them may see what is going to be done. Now, I do not think it matters to the carrying out of these provisions whether this person can be found or not, for the statute clearly provides that if he is found he is to put the premises in repair, but if not, then the nuisance is to be abated in another way, namely, by sale. There is no provision for ascertaining what are the rights and burdens affecting the property before the sale, but there is a provision that after the sale the purchase money is to be consigned in bank, and the Sheriff is then to proceed to ascertain what share in the consigned money each person interested in the property is entitled to. Now, from that it appears to me that it is not intended that these interests should be ascertained first, but that the property should be sold first, and then these people claiming rights in the property are to come before the Sheriff, who will ascertain their interests and rank them to their proper shares of the sum consigned in bank. I think therefore that the judgment of the Sheriff was right, and that we should dismiss this appeal.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

1ST DIVISION.

MESSRS JOHN DARNEY & COMPANY, who had previously carried on business as gluemakers at Kinghorn, Fifeshire, acquired a disused paper mill at Kinauld, Currie, in the Calder District of Midlothian, and proceeded in September 1902 to alter the mill to suit the requirements of their business.

In April 1903 the Calder District Committee of the County Council of Midlothian as Local Authority for that district under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, issued an order whereby, under section 32, subsec. (1) of that Act, they declared that the business of glue manufacturing should be "an offensive business under and within the meaning of the said Act, section, and subsection." * This order was confirmed by the Local Government Board on 1st May 1903, and duly gazetted thereafter.

On 10th July 1903 Messrs John Darney & Son, in view of this order, made application to the District Committee for sanction to commence the manufacture of glue and gelatine in the premises at Kinauld before mentioned.

On 4th August 1903 the District Committee decided that the application might be granted, but resolved to delay issuing their sanction until bye-laws should be framed and confirmed by the Local Government Board. Bye-laws as to the manufacture of glue were adjusted by the District Committee, and submitted to the Local Government Board on 30th December 1903. These bye-laws were confirmed by the Board on 6th January 1904.

On 9th February 1904 the District Committee issued the following order:—"In terms of section 32 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, we, the Local Authority of the Calder District of the county of Midlothian, by this our order sanction, under the condition that the products of the business are manufactured from hide clippings only, the establishment of the business of glue, gelatine, or size manufacturer in the premises situated at Kinauld, near Currie, as shewn on the plans submitted along with the application of Messrs John Darney & Son, glue manufacturers, Kinghorn, dated 10th July 1903."

Messrs Darney objected to the insertion of the condition as to manufacturing "from hide clippings only," as being ultra vires of the Local Authority, and asked that an order should be issued without any such condition, but only under the bye-laws as confirmed by the Local Government Board. The District Committee refused to grant such an order. Messrs Darney did not appeal to the County Council under section 32 (2) of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897.

The bye-laws did not contain any provision as to the products of the business of glue making being manufactured from hide clippings only.

On 2d March 1904 Messrs Darney brought the present action, in which they called as defenders the Calder District Committee of the County Council of Midlothian, and the Clerk to the Committee. The pursuers concluded (1) for reduction of the order above quoted, dated 9th February 1904, sanctioning the establishment of the business of glue, gelatine, or size manufacturing by the pursuers, "which order contains a condition that the products of the pursuers' business are to be manufactured from hide clippings only, incompetently inserted therein by the said Calder District Committee," in so far as the order imposed "a condition not authorised by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, and not in conformity with the bye-laws for glue manufacturing" above mentioned; (2) for declarator that the order granted to the pursuers should "be valid and effectual to the pursuers in all time coming, and that as if the said condition, whereby the pursuers

"(3) The Local Authority may make bye-laws for regulating the conduct of any businesses within the meaning of this section . . . which are for the time being lawfully carried on in their district, and the structure of the premises in which any such business is being carried on, in order to prevent or diminish the noxious or injurious effect thereof, and the mode in which the said application is to be made."

are required to manufacture their products from hide clippings only had not been inserted in the said order"; and (3) for decree ordaining the Clerk to the District Committee "to correct the foresaid order by . . . deleting the condition complained of."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—2. The action is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

On 30th June 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low), after hearing counsel in the Procedure Roll, issued this interlocutor:—"Sustains the second plea in law for the defenders: Dismisses the action, and decerns."*

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuers aver that the condition attached to the order will seriously prejudice them in their business, and that it was ultra vires of the defenders to impose such a condition. The pursuers argued that under the Act the defenders were bound either to grant or withhold their sanction to an offensive business, and that although they were empowered to make bye-laws for regulating such businesses, they were not entitled to qualify an order sanctioning a business with a condition not appearing in the bye-laws. The defenders had in fact made bye-laws dealing, inter alia, with the manufacture of glue, in which there was no such condition as that appearing in the order sanctioning the pursuers' business.

"In these circumstances, the pursuers seek in this action to have the order reduced in so far as it imposes the condition, and also a decree declaring that the order 'shall be valid and effectual to the pursuers in all time coming, and that as if the said condition, whereby the pursuers are required to manufacture their products from hide clippings only, had not been inserted in said order.'

"What, therefore, the pursuers ask the Court to do is to convert a conditional order of the defenders into an absolute order unfettered by any condition.

"The first question is whether the Court has power to do any such thing, and that depends upon the provisions of subsection 2 of section 32 of the Act. The subsection provides that the Local Authority shall give their sanction to the establishment of a business falling within the category of 'offensive,' by order, but that, before making such order, they shall, after advertisement of the application, hear and consider any objections which may be made to the granting of the order, and shall then 'grant or withhold their sanction as they think expedient; and where the Local Authority grants or withholds such sanction, any person aggrieved may appeal to the Board, whose decision shall be final.'

"These provisions make it plain that the granting or withholding of sanction to establish an offensive business is a matter with which this Court has nothing to do, and therefore it seems to me to be quite incompetent to ask the Court to declare that a conditional sanction which was given by the Local Authority falls to be regarded and acted on as if it had been an absolute and unconditional sanction.

"The pursuers argued, however, that they could not appeal to the Local Authority against the order which had been made, because the Act only allowed an appeal 'where the Local Authority grants or withholds such sanction,' and here it could not be said that the Local Authority had done either the one or the other.

"Now, if the pursuers had simply sought to have the order set aside altogether, so as to leave it to the defenders to issue a new order, either unconditionally granting or withholding sanction to the business, there would have been something to be said in favour of that being done. What the pursuers ask, however, is only a partial reduction, and I doubt whether under the summons as framed it would be competent to pronounce a decree reducing the order in toto.

"Further, I am not impressed by the argument that, looking to the form

No. 45.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The insertion of the condition in the order was ultra vires of the Local Authority. They were not entitled to put restrictions upon such manufacturers by limiting their sanction, but only by bye-laws duly confirmed by the Local Government Board.* This was also a privilegium, which was illegal. (2) The form of the action was the same as in Macbeth v. Ashley.[1] No doubt the result of granting decree as concluded for would be that the pursuers would get an unlimited sanction instead of a sanction sub conditione, although the Local Authority would not have granted their sanction at all except sub conditione. But that was just what happened in the case of Macbeth.[1] The pursuers were entitled, not as matter of discretion, but ex debito justitiæ, to have what was a legal nullity struck out of the order. (Counsel also cited Rossi v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.[2]) (3) The pursuers could not have appealed to the County Council and Local Government Board, because the sanction of the Local Authority had been granted, not refused. If the insertion of the condition was legally within the powers of the Local Authority the pursuers could not appeal against the insertion of it.[3] The question was one of law purely which the County Council and Local Government Board could not have decided, and which for their guidance must first be determined by the Court.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—(1) The insertion of the condition in the order was intra vires of the Local Authority. (2) But whether it was or was not this action was incompetent. The case of Macbeth v. Ashley[1] had no bearing. The form of certificate there was statutory. The condition was separable. The certificate could stand without the condition. Here that was not so. The condition in this case could not be taken out of the order without in effect granting the very thing which the Local Authority had refused to grant. What the pursuers asked for was that the Court should grant them a sanction to carry on an offensive trade. This the Court had no power to do. The case of Rossi[2] was not in point. There also the conditions objected to were separable; but further, the difficulty here did not arise, as the effect of the decree obtained by the pursuer in that case was not to give him a licence to do anything. He had of the order, the pursuers might not be entitled to appeal. I think that it is clear that the pursuers have right to appeal to the Local Authority against the order. The criticism upon the way in which the order is framed is very technical. The defenders were not prepared to sanction the establishment by the pursuers of a glue manufactory in which all the materials from which glue may be made might be used, but only of a manufactory in which hide clippings alone were used. If the order had sanctioned the establishment of a business of glue manufacturers from hide clippings only, it would, I think, have been unobjectionable in point of form, but the order which the defenders granted was in substance precisely to the same effect.

"I shall therefore dismiss the action as being incompetent."

still to go to the proper authority for a licence. The proper course for the pursuers was to have appealed to the County Council.* The sanction which they asked for had been in effect withheld. If they had not availed themselves of the remedy provided by the statute the present action was also incompetent upon that ground.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action brought by a firm, who are manufacturers of glue, and propose to set up a glue manufactory in the defenders' district. On 10th July 1903 they made application to the defenders, who are the Local Authority under the Public Health Act, for their sanction to commence the manufacture of glue. That application stood over for some time because the Local Authority was preparing bye-laws as to the manufacture of glue. We are told that after considerable delay these bye-laws were adjusted, and that they were finally confirmed by the Local Government Board on 6th January 1904. The pursuers set forth two of these bye-laws, which refer to the manner in which the business of glue manufacture is to be carried on. These bye-laws having been confirmed, the Local Authority on 9th February 1904 issued this order—(His Lordship read the defenders' order of that date). That is the only order pronounced, and that is the order which we have to consider. The pursuers' application was an unlimited application for sanction to manufacture glue in any way they could. The sanction given was subject to the condition that the products of the business should be manufactured "from hide clippings only." That was a limited sanction granted on an application for an unlimited sanction.

That being so, this action was brought, concluding not for a total reduction of the order but only for reduction of it to a limited extent. The pursuers ask for reduction of the order in so far as it imposes a condition "that the products of the pursuers' business are to be manufactured from hide clippings only." Then there follows a conclusion for declarator, that the "order granted to the pursuers shall be valid and effectual to the pursuers in all time coming, and that as if the said condition whereby the pursuers are required to manufacture their products from hide clippings only had not been inserted in the said order."

It is perfectly clear that the effect of a decree of reduction in the terms asked would be to turn a limited order, sanctioning the manufacture of glue from hide clippings only, into an order sanctioning the manufacture of glue in any way whatever.

The ground of the pursuers'-contention in support of the conclusions of their summons is this:—The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897,† section 32, by subsection (1) enacts, that anyone who establishes, without the sanction of the Local Authority, any of certain businesses enumerated, or any other business which the Local Authority by order confirmed by the Local Government Board may declare to be an offensive business, shall be liable to a penalty. The business of glue manufacturing is not one of the businesses enumerated, but the defenders, by order duly confirmed, had declared it to be an offensive business. By subsection (3) it is enacted, that the Local Authority, subject to confirmation by the Local Government Board (as provided by section 185 of the Act), may make bye-laws for regulating the conduct of offensive business; and the pursuers say that the defenders accordingly made application for the sanction of certain bye-laws by the Local Government Board with regard to the manufacture of glue, and that certain bye-laws were duly confirmed, and these they contend contain the only conditions with regard to the making of glue which it is legal for the Local Authority to impose on any manufacturer who wants to make glue in their district. The pursuers say that by their order the defenders have imposed a condition which is not in their bye-laws, namely, the restriction to manufacture from hide clippings only. They say this is illegal, and that being illegal they are entitled to have it struck out of the order, and to have the order left standing as an unconditional sanction to manufacture glue in any way whatever; that is to say, they want to convert a conditional sanction into an unconditional sanction, which the Local Authority never gave them.

The Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action as incompetent, and I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary. The question is whether the pursuers had the sanction of the Local Authority to the carrying on of this business in any way, or only their sanction to carrying it on in a particular limited way. No one can doubt that the defenders' sanction was not unlimited. An unlimited sanction was what was asked for and refused. What authority has this Court to convert an order giving a limited sanction into an order giving a sanction unlimited in any way? It has none.

In the case of Macbeth v. Ashley[1] the condition was quite separable from the licence. If here the condition were separable I could understand the pursuers' contention, but that is not the case. The sanction granted is for the manufacture of glue in a particular way, and in that way only.

It may be a question whether that condition was legal or not, but whether it was legal or not it is plain that the pursuers did not get the sanction of the Local Authority to carry on the manufacture in the way they desire.

I think that is enough for the decision of this case. But I am disposed to think the defenders' order was tantamount to a refusal of the pursuers' application, and it would rather appear to me that the pursuers had a right of appeal to the County Council, and from them to the Local Government Board, and if so, this action would be incompetent on that ground, for if an appeal is given by the statute the statutory procedure must be followed. But it is not necessary to decide that question, for I think it is quite incompetent, by means of a partial reduction, to convert a conditional sanction into a sanction which is unlimited.

I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary, and think that we should adhere to his interlocutor.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I do not think that it is competent for the Court to grant decree in the terms asked for, and I do not think that the competency of doing so is a technical question arising out of a criticism of the terms of the summons, but is a question of substance as to the right of the pursuers to obtain the remedy they seek, and the power of the Court to grant such a remedy. I agree with your Lordship that we cannot grant it. The pursuers made application to the defenders for sanction to commence the manufacture of glue and gelatine in the premises erected and equipped by them at Kinauld, which is within the defenders' district. I understand that the application was for an absolute sanction, and that, had it been granted in the terms asked for, it would have enabled the pursuers to carry on their manufacture by any lawful methods known to the trade. It was, however, not granted in this form, but the Local Authority issued an order giving their sanction "under the condition that the products of the business are manufactured from hide clippings only." Now, that order starts no doubt by giving a sanction in affirmative form, but it goes on to add a condition implying a distinct negative to what the pursuers ask for, for it says, "You are to carry on this manufacture from hide clippings only," while what was asked for was leave to carry it on by every lawful method. I do not think it necessary to decide whether this condition was or was not ultra vires of the Local Authority, for it is not brought before us in a form in which we can decide that question, although I think that it is a perfectly proper question to be brought before the Court for consideration, if it is brought in a proper way. But here what we are asked to do is not only to determine, as a question of law, that the condition was incompetent, but to strike out of the order that portion of it which is said to be incompetent and to leave the rest standing, so that it will be transformed into an unconditional sanction to carry on the manufacture of glue by any known method. Now, I agree with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary that that is just asking us to grant what was refused by the Local Authority. It is said to be a question whether the Local Authority can be held to have withheld this sanction or not, and we cannot say what they would do if they were advised that they must either grant it unconditionally or refuse it. But certainly they have not granted it unconditionally as yet, and if we give decree in the terms asked for we shall just be doing what they have not yet done. We shall in fact be giving a sanction to carry on one of the offensive trades, and that I think this Court has no power to do.

I do not see that any difficulty is created by the two cases that were cited by the reclaimers. In the case of Ashley[1] the licence and the illegal condition were quite easily separable, and the Court held that, if the condition were struck out, the licence, which the licensing authority had intended to grant, could still stand. The difficulty which arises here was not raised by any of the Judges or by the counsel in that case. The case of Rossi[2] too does not apply to the present proceedings, for there what was sought was a general declarator that certain conditions could not be legally inserted in a certificate, but no certificate had as yet been granted. So in that case there was no risk that the effect of the decree would be to grant a sanction which had been refused; the applicant would still have to go to the licensing authority for his licence, and would not be obtaining it by a decree of this Court. Here what we are asked to do must have a very different consequence. I agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary that this action must be dismissed.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I agree with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary.

This is an "offensive business" which cannot be established without the sanction of the Local Authority, and no one else can give that sanction. This Court cannot. The question is, have the pursuers got the sanction of the Local Authority? They have not, except under a certain condition. I do not say whether it was legal to impose that condition or not. The pursuers will not accept the sanction with that condition. But they have no other. The question is, can we, by striking out the condition said to be ultra vires, affirm that the Local Authority have sanctioned this manufacture? I think we cannot. The point is well expressed by the Lord Ordinary when he says:—"What, therefore, the pursuers ask the Court to do is to convert a conditional order of the defenders into an absolute order unfettered by any condition. The first question is, whether the Court has power to do any such thing." I think there is no doubt the answer must be as the Lord Ordinary has answered it, in the negative. I concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordships.

Limitation of Action—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 1.—The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, sec. 1, enacts that no action shall lie against any person on account, inter alia, of any act done in the "execution, or intended execution," of "any public duty" unless the action is commenced within six months next after the act complained of.

The Magistrates of a burgh let the town hall, which belonged to the common good of the burgh, to A, a public entertainments manager, for the purpose of giving a public entertainment therein on 7th September 1903. On that day the Magistrates refused to allow A the use of the town hall unless he agreed to omit a wrestling competition from the entertainment, and A having refused to do this, the entertainment did not take place.

On 8th April 1904 A brought an action of damages for breach of contract against the Magistrates, who pleaded sec. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that the Act did not apply.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

BY letters dated 24th and 29th July 1903, the Magistrates of Greenock agreed to let the Town Hall of Greenock to William Cross M'Phie, public entertainments manager, 375 Eglinton Street, Glasgow, for 7th, 8th, and 9th September 1903, for the purpose of giving public entertainments therein. On the 7th of September, the day fixed for the first entertainment, the Magistrates refused to allow M'Phie the use of the hall unless he agreed to omit a wrestling competition from the performance. This he refused to do, and accordingly the Magistrates would not allow him to use the hall, with the result that he was unable to give the proposed entertainments.

On 8th April 1904 M'Phie brought an action against the Magistrates concluding for £500 as damages for breach of contract in respect of the defenders' refusal to allow him the use of the Town Hall.

In defence the Magistrates stated,—(Ans. 2) " . . . The Greenock Town Hall belongs to the defenders in their corporate capacity. . . . The defenders let said hall in the discharge of their public duty, and the rents derived from letting it form part of the burgh revenues"; and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is barred by section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses as between agent and client.*

On 29th October 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—" Repels the first plea in law stated for the defenders: Allows to the pursuer a proof of his averments, and to the defenders of their answers thereto; and appoints the same to proceed on a day to be afterwards fixed." †

* The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. c. 61), sec. 1, enacts:—" Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect," inter alia, " (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of . . ."

† " OPINION.— . . . The action was not brought until more than six months after the date when the use of the hall was refused to the pursuer, and the defenders plead that the action is thereby barred in terms of the provisions of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

" The question, therefore, is, whether this is a case to which that Act applies.

" The defenders are undoubtedly a public authority, but that alone is not sufficient to render the statute applicable. It must also be shewn that this action is brought 'for an act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of an Act of Parliament, or of a public duty or authority, or in respect of an alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority.'

" It is not said that the defenders were acting in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, but it is contended that they were acting in the execution of a public duty. It appears that the defenders are in the habit of letting the town hall for meetings and entertainments, and the rent obtained forms part of the revenue of the burgh. The argument is that, as the defenders are a public authority, and as they were letting the hall not with a view to private gain but for the purpose of increasing the revenue of the burgh, they were acting in the execution of a public duty. I am unable to take that view. It seems to me that in letting the hall the defenders were not acting qua public authority, but as managers or trustees for the burgh, whose duty it was to administer the burgh property to the best advantage.

No. 46.

Dec. 10, 1904. M'Phie v. Magistrates of Greenock.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The defenders in refusing to allow the pursuer the use of the town hall for the purpose of a wrestling competition were acting in the "intended execution of a public duty" within the meaning of section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893; they were therefore entitled to the benefit of the Act. It was no answer that the Act was done in the way of municipal trading, out of which the corporation might make a profit.[1]

The pursuer was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the Lord Ordinary is right. The cases referred to by Mr M'Lennan were in connection with acts done in pursuance of statutory duties. Here the question is whether or not the Corporation of Greenock acted in breach of a contract entered into with a private individual. They entered into a contract with the pursuer, as he alleges, whereby he was to have the use of the Town Hall of Greenock for certain entertainments, and it is said that they failed to implement their contract. They were under no obligation, statutory or otherwise, to have a town hall at all. If they had one they could use it as they pleased, and if they let it the profit went to the common good. They are just in the position of individuals who have halls to let, and if they let them for the purposes of public exhibitions, and afterwards have reason to think that the exhibitions are such that they are legally entitled to stop them, then if they are willing to run the risk of an action of damages they are quite entitled to do so. It is out of the question to say that in letting the town hall the defenders were acting in pursuance of a public duty, statutory or otherwise. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD YOUNG.—I think that this is a very clear case. The pursuer sues for damages on account of actionable breach of contract which he says has been committed by the defenders, who are the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of the burgh of Greenock. Now, I know of no principle or authority which could have influenced the Legislature to place public bodies in a favoured position in regard to liability for breach of contract, and consequently in construing this statute I decline to attribute such an intention

I do not think that the management of the property of a burgh is a public duty within the meaning of the Act.

"The case might have been different if the position taken up by the defenders had been that they stopped the performance, not as the managers of the burgh property, but as Magistrates, and because in their judgment it was in the public interest that the proposed exhibition of wrestling should not be allowed to proceed. That view, however, was not suggested, the only argument being that to which I have already referred.

"I am therefore of opinion that the action is not barred by the statute, and I shall accordingly repel the first plea in law for the defenders, and allow a proof."

to the Legislature. Suppose that these defenders had contracted with a tradesman to put this hall into good order so that they might let it, is the Corporation exempt by Act of Parliament from paying the contract price if the tradesman does not render his account for six months after the completion of the work? If they do not pay, why should they not be liable in damages for the breach of their contract to pay? I am very clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was right in repelling the first plea in law for the defenders, and that we should adhere to his judgment.

LORD TRAYNER.—The only question raised in this reclaiming note is whether the first plea in law for the defenders should be repelled or sustained. The Lord Ordinary has repelled it and allowed a proof, and I think he has acted rightly. The plea is that this action is barred by section 1 of the Public Authorities Act, 1893. What is here complained of is that the defenders failed to implement the contract with the pursuer by which they let to him the Town Hall of Greenock. But the defenders were under no obligation to let the hall, and if they did so they acted, not under any public authority conferred on them, or public duty laid upon them, but merely as the persons having charge of the building. They had the hall in their hands to let or not as they pleased.

Bankruptcy—Composition—Reasonable Offer—Spes successionis—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 138, 139.—Held that an offer of composition by a sequestrated bankrupt which did not take into account a valuable interest in a succession which, although not vested in the bankrupt, would accrue to him in the event of his surviving his mother, who was eighty years of age, was not a reasonable offer in the sense of section 138 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

HENRY BRADSHAW, stockbroker, Glasgow, whose estates had been sequestrated, at a meeting of his creditors held after his examination on 20th July 1904, made an offer of a composition of five shillings per pound on his debts at the date of the sequestration, payable within one month after his discharge. The bankrupt also offered to pay the expense of the sequestration and the remuneration of the trustee, and offered James Henry Bradshaw as his security.

The meeting unanimously agreed to entertain the offer, and directed the trustee, James R. Hodge, chartered accountant, Glasgow, to give the necessary notices for having the same decided upon at another meeting of creditors.

In the notice calling another meeting of creditors on 24th August 1904, to consider the offer of composition in accordance with the provisions of section 139* of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, the trustee set forth a state of affairs shewing liabilities £678, 14s. 7d.; assets, £20, 18s. 6d., and appended the following note:—"The bankrupt's father died about three years ago leaving heritable and moveable estate valued at £11,259, 10s., but subject to liferent of his widow, and on her death to be divided equally among her children, of whom there are six, but I am advised that this does not vest in the children unless they survive their mother, and therefore I am unable to place any value on the share provided for the bankrupt under his father's will."

The bankrupt's father, Philip Bradshaw, by his will dated 9th February 1891 and recorded 26th July 1901, conveyed his estates to trustees, and directed them to pay the income of the residue to his wife in liferent for her liferent alimentary use allenarly, and on the decease of the longest liver of him and his wife to divide and pay the whole residue of his estate equally among and to his whole children, except his son James; "Declaring that if any of my said children shall die before receiving payment of their shares above provided to them, and leave lawful issue, the share or shares which would have fallen to such deceaser or deceasers shall be divided equally among and paid to such issue per stirpes."

At the date of the offer of composition the bankrupt's mother was eighty years of age and in infirm health.

The creditors at their meeting on 24th August 1904 resolved by a majority in number and four-fifths in value of those present to accept the composition and security offered.

On 19th September 1904 the trustee reported to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire that the composition had been accepted by the requisite majority of creditors in number and value, and produced the bond of caution granted by Henry Bradshaw as principal, and James Henry Bradshaw as cautioner, all in terms of section 138 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

James Kirkwood & Sons, stockbrokers, 62 Buchanan Street, Glasgow, who were creditors of the bankrupt for £93, 16s. 6d., lodged a note of objections to the offer of composition in which they maintained, inter alia,—"6. The offer is not reasonable, in respect that the bankrupt has an interest in his father's estate which, if realised, would be more than sufficient to pay the creditors 20s. per £."

On 24th October 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard the agents for the bankrupt and for the opposing creditors James Kirkwood & Sons, and considered the objections lodged by the said opposing creditors, for the reasons contained in the annexed note, Finds that the offer of composition made by the bankrupt is not reasonable; therefore refuses his discharge, and decerns." *

* "NOTE.—The offer in question was made at a meeting of the creditors called by the trustee, who reported that the bankrupt's father died three years ago leaving estate valued at £11,259, 10s., but subject to the liferent of his widow, and on her death to be divided equally among his children, of whom there were six, but the trustee adds, 'I am advised that this does not vest in the children unless they survive their mother, and therefore I am unable to place any value on the share provided for the bankrupt under his father's will.'

"The facts of the case are that the bankrupt is one of a family of six, and his mother is living, but she is eighty years of age and in infirm health. The bankrupt's claim on the father's estate amounts to over £2000, and the claims in the sequestration amount to £670. The offer of five shillings

The bankrupt appealed, and argued;—The bankrupt's interest in his father's estate had not vested. A direction to pay on the death of a liferentrix coupled with a destination-over to the issue of predeceasing children, postponed vesting till the death of the liferentrix, and the Sheriff had failed to notice the recent authorities to that effect.[1] The bankrupt's interest in his father's estate was therefore only a spes successionis. He could not be compelled to assign it, and it did not fall under the sequestration.[2] The fact that the bankrupt had the chance of succeeding to a share of his father's estate did not make the offer of composition unreasonable.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD ADAM.—The interlocutor of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire which is submitted to review is in these terms:—(His Lordship read the interlocutor). The Sheriff finds that the offer was not reasonable, and that is the whole question before us. The circumstances of the case are these. The bankrupt made an offer of composition of 5s. in the pound, which was approved of at the necessary statutory meetings by the requisite majority in number and value of the creditors. By the 139th section of the Bankruptcy Act it is provided that when an offer of composition has been made, if "a majority in number and four-fifths in value of the creditors present should accept the said offer and security, a bond of caution shall be lodged, and a report made and a deliverance pronounced, all in the same manner and to the same effect as hereinbefore provided." The latter words refer to the 138th section, where it is provided "that the trustee shall thereupon subscribe and transmit a report of the resolution of the meeting, with the said per £ amounts to about £170. These facts were admitted by the bankrupt's agent, and the question comes to be whether the bankrupt's share in his father's estate has already vested in him or does not vest till his mother's death.

"By the father's will he conveyed his estates to trustees and directed them to pay the income of the residue to his wife in liferent, and on the decease of the longest liver of him and his wife he directed his trustees to divide and pay the whole residue of his estate equally among his whole children excepting one son, and he declared that if any of his children should die before receiving payment of their shares leaving lawful issue the shares which would have fallen to such deceasers should be divided among such issue per stirpes. The trustee states that he has been advised that the bankrupt's share does not vest in him unless he survives his mother, but he does not say who has given him this advice, and I am of opinion that according to the authorities the bankrupt's share has already vested in him. The leading recent cases on the subject are Ross's Trustees, 12 R. 378; Hay's Trustees v. Hay, 17 R. 961; and Ross's Trustees v. Ross, 25 R. 65, to which I refer. . . . If this be so, the offer of five shillings per £ is quite unreasonable, because the creditors would on the footing of the share having vested get 20s. per £ on their debts. The asset is one which, notwithstanding of the widow's survivance, could readily be disposed of for a substantial sum."

bond, to the Bill-Chamber Clerk or Sheriff-clerk in order that the approval of the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff (whichever may be selected by the trustee) may be obtained thereto; and if the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, after hearing any objection by creditors, shall find that the offer, with the security, has been duly made, and is reasonable, and has been assented to by a majority in number and nine-tenths in value of all the creditors assembled at the said meeting, he shall pronounce a deliverance approving thereof, provided that he shall hear any objection by opposing creditors, and if he shall refuse to sustain the offer or reject the vote of any creditor, he shall specify the grounds of refusal or rejection." Now, this offer was assented to by the requisite majority of the creditors, but it was also objected to by one creditor on the ground that it was not reasonable, in respect that the bankrupt had an interest in his father's estate which, if realised, would be more than sufficient to pay the creditors twenty shillings in the pound. It was on this ground that the Sheriff founded his decree refusing the discharge, and the question submitted to us is, was this a reasonable offer?

The facts as to the bankrupt's interest in his father's estate are stated by the trustee in his report to the creditors as follows:—(His Lordship read the trustee's note appended to the notice calling the meeting of 24th August 1904). That was the advice given by the trustee to the creditors, but the ground on which the Sheriff proceeded is stated in his note to be,—"I am therefore of opinion that the share has vested in the bankrupt. If this be so, the offer of five shillings per £ is quite unreasonable, because the creditors would on the footing of the share having vested get 20s. per £ on their debts. The asset is one which, notwithstanding of the widow's survivance, could readily be disposed of for a substantial sum." I should not be disposed to agree with the Sheriff-substitute in his views as to vesting, for I do not think this testament gave a vested interest. The testator provides a liferent to his wife, and disposes of the residue on her death in these terms:—(His Lordship read the bequest of residue and the destination). Now, it is to be observed that no right is given to any of the children, except by the instruction to the trustees to pay to them on the death of the widow a certain proportion of the residue, and on these clauses alone it seems to me unnecessary to consider Bowman[1] and the cases following it. But if we are to consider the case of Bowman,[1] then I think it is also clear that there is here a destination-over. I am of opinion that here there was no vesting, but merely a spes successionis, and not a vested interest. But however that be, it makes no difference to the question of the reasonableness of this offer, for although this right was not vested in the bankrupt, and so not carried to the trustee by the vesting clause in his favour, yet here there was an expectancy of £2000 depending on the life of an old lady of eighty, and that was clearly a valuable asset, and would sell for a large sum, for much more than the £170 offered for a composition, and, indeed, I have little doubt that the bankrupt could sell this right at any time for enough to pay off the creditors in full. Now, I think that in view of that valuable asset in the possession of the bankrupt the offer of a composition of five shillings in the pound was not a reasonable offer, and on that ground I think the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be affirmed.

LORD M'LAREN.—Bankruptcy appeals, which often do not relate to sums of large amount, may be important in point of principle, because they regulate procedure for all future cases. It is therefore necessary to keep the points which have been argued to us clearly distinguished. In the case of Reid v. Morison,[1] which was a case of what may be called a compulsory winding-up, it was held by this Division along with three consulted Judges of the Second Division, that a trustee was not entitled to refuse his consent to a discharge because the bankrupt had not given up an interest which had not vested in him. But there are means even in such a case by which a bankrupt may be induced to make an interest which has not vested available to his creditors to some extent. The conditions are quite different when the estate is being wound up by the acceptance of a composition offer. In the present case an offer has been made which does not take into account an interest which will accrue to the bankrupt on the death of his mother, and the question is whether that is a reasonable offer of composition. The Sheriff has held that the offer is not reasonable, because in his opinion the bankrupt's interest has vested and falls under the sequestration. I am not of opinion that the interest in question has vested, but anything said on this subject will not have any influence on the question of vesting should it hereafter arise for decision. Assuming, however, that the interest has not vested, the fact remains that the bankrupt is possessed of an asset of considerable value, and the trustee is entitled to go through all the forms permitted by the Bankruptcy Act, and to take his chance that before the estate is wound up this asset may fall into the sequestration. A prudent trustee would say that there was no advantage in accepting an offer of five shillings in the pound with the chance of a good estate falling in, and would, so far as he had power, elect to keep up the sequestration. That is a good reason why, if the bankrupt desires to settle by way of composition, he should make a reasonable contribution out of the funds which will fall to him on the death of his mother. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships. I assume that all the proceedings have been regular, but I observe that that is merely an assumption, because Mr Morison tells us that, assuming the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is wrong, he still has objections of a formidable nature. I agree, however, that the decision of the Sheriff-substitute is right, though I am not able to assent to the grounds in law upon which it is based. It is at best very doubtful whether the interest in question has vested, but without deciding that question, which is not before us, I agree with your Lordships that the bankrupt has a spes successionis which is certainly capable of being valued. The only condition upon which the bankrupt's right depends is his survivance of an aged and infirm lady, and that is an interest which is taken into account and valued by insurance companies every day. The question therefore is whether it is reasonable that the creditors should be compelled to accept a small composition without taking into account an interest which is capable of being turned into money, and I agree that it is not. The case of Reid v. Morison[1] decided that a bankrupt could not be compelled to assign a spes successionis, because it was not attachable by diligence nor carried by the vesting clause of the Bankruptcy Act. But it is a very different matter to say that it is not reasonable to take such an interest into account when the bankrupt claims to put an end to the sequestration by offering to his creditors a small composition for a full discharge. I am of opinion that this is not an offer which the majority of the creditors can compel the minority to accept.

[1] 20 R. 510.

No. 47.

ARCHIBALD FINNIE & SON, Appellants.—Guthrie, K.C.—A. Moncrieff. ROBERT DUNCAN, Respondent.—Macmillan.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Schedule, secs. (11) and (12)—Review of Weekly Payment—Obstruction of Medical Examination.—An injured workman, in receipt of weekly payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, went to Australia without intimating to his employers that he was going or leaving his address.

In an application by the employers for review of the weekly payments, the Court suspended in hoc statu the workman's right to the weekly payments on the ground that he was obstructing medical examination in the sense of sec. (11) of the First Schedule of the Act.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Ayrshire.

THIS was an appeal on a case stated by the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie), at Kilmarnock, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, between Archibald Finnie & Son, coal-masters, Kilmarnock, petitioners and appellants, and Robert Duncan, miner, 39 Kirkland Rows, Springside, by Kilmarnock, respondent.

The case set forth:—"The respondent was injured on 6th July 1903, by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a miner in the service of the petitioners, and in December 1903 he underwent an operation in the Western Infirmary, Glasgow, by which the semi-lunar cartilage of his right knee was removed, that cartilage having been injured by the accident which he suffered. The petitioners paid the respondent compensation regularly at the rate of 10s. 1d. per week, being the full amount to which he was entitled under the said Act, from the date of the accident to 11th April 1904. On 23d June 1904 the petitioners presented a petition craving the Court, under paragraph 12 of the First Schedule appended to said Act, to review said weekly payments in respect that respondent's incapacity for work terminated on or before 11th April 1904. After proof, I, on 27th July 1904, pronounced an interlocutor, repelling the respondent's preliminary pleas as to the incompetency of the petition, and finding that the respondent was then able for light labouring work, at which he might be capable of earning 15s. per week, and I accordingly diminished said weekly payments from 10s. 1d. to 5s. per week until the further orders of the Court, without expenses to either party. From this award no appeal was taken.

"On 21st October 1904 the petitioners lodged a minute in process again craving the Court, under paragraph 12 of the First Schedule appended to said Act, to review the weekly payments of 5s. per week awarded to the respondent by my said interlocutor of 27th July 1904 in respect that the respondent had left this country and gone to Australia, and that the petitioners had no opportunity of having him medically examined, or of ascertaining his bodily condition. Immediately on the lodging of this minute I ordered service of the minute on the respondent at his last known address, and at the Edictal Citation Office, and also intimation to his known agent in Kilmarnock. No proof was led, but on 9th November 1904 I heard parties' agents, when it was admitted that the respondent had left this country for Australia in the beginning of August 1904 leaving his wife at home, without intimation to the petitioners that he was going, or what his address would be. Respondent's agent stated that the respondent had gone to Australia for the benefit of his health, his passage having been paid by a relative. The petitioners' agent stated that he had no information on this subject."

On 16th November 1904 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor refusing in hoc statu the crave of the minute of 21st October 1904, in respect (1) that it was not stated in said minute that the respondent had permanently left this country, or that any steps had been taken by the petitioners to have him medically examined, and (2) that no change in the state of his incapacity was averred to have taken place since the award of 27th July 1904.

The question of law was:—"In the circumstances stated does the compensation awarded to the respondent on 27th July 1904 fall to be ended or diminished by reason of the respondent having left Scotland for Australia without notice to the appellants; and, assuming the question to be answered in the affirmative, should the compensation be ended or diminished, (a) from the date of his departure, or (b) from the date of judgment in this application?" *

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), enacts:—First Schedule—"(11) Any workman receiving weekly payments under this Act shall, if so required by the employer, or by any person by whom the employer is entitled under this Act to be indemnified, from time to time submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer, or such other person; but if the workman objects to an examination by that medical practitioner, or is dissatisfied by the certificate of such practitioner upon his condition when communicated to him, he may submit himself for examination to one of the medical practitioners appointed for the purposes of this Act, as mentioned in the Second Schedule to this Act, and the certificate of that medical practitioner as to the condition of the workman at the time of the examination shall be given to the employer and workman, and shall be conclusive of that condition. If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to such weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place.

"(12) Any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request of the employer or the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased, subject to the examination above provided, and the amount of payment shall, in default of agreement, be settled by arbitration under this Act."

No. 48.

Dec. 13, 1904.
Finnie & Son
v. Duncan.

Argued for the appellants;—The respondent had by his own act made it impossible to have the examination provided for by this Act. There was no official medical referee in Australia. The respondent was therefore obstructing examination, and his right to weekly payment should be suspended in hoc statu. Obstruction did not necessarily mean wilful obstruction.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent had gone to Australia for the benefit of his health, and the appellants could instruct a medical man to examine him there. The Act should be interpreted liberally, and granting that this was a casus improvisus the respondent was not wilfully obstructing examination in the sense of the Act.

LORD ADAM.—The respondent, Robert Duncan, who was in the employment of the appellants, was injured, on 6th July 1903, by an accident in the course of his employment. The injury involved an operation, described in the stated case as the removal of the semi-lunar cartilage of his right knee. The appellants paid compensation under the Workmen's Compensation for some time from the date of the accident at the rate of 10s. 1d. per week. After a time it appeared to the appellants that this weekly payment should be modified, and they petitioned the Sheriff to review the weekly payment, with the result that the Sheriff on 27th July 1904 diminished the payment to 5s. per week. On 21st October 1904 the appellants applied again to the Sheriff to review the weekly payment. The Sheriff ordered the application to be served at the last known address of the respondent, and also edictally, and caused intimation to be made to his last known agent. When the case came up there was no proof led, but it was admitted that the respondent had gone to Australia for the benefit of his health, and the respondent's agent stated that he had no further information about him. In these circumstances the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor—(His Lordship quoted the Sheriff's interlocutor).

The effect of this interlocutor, if adhered to, is that 5s. per week will be continued until further evidence of the respondent's condition is brought forward, and this cannot be done as long as Duncan remains abroad. By sec. 3 of Schedule I. an injured workman may, before compensation is fixed, be required to submit himself to examination by a medical practitioner selected by the employer, and, if he refuses or obstructs the examination, his right to compensation is suspended. After the weekly payment is fixed, it may, under sec. 12, be reviewed at the request of either party, and ended, diminished, or increased, the amount being settled by arbitration. Now, here the appellants thought that this was a case in which the payment to the respondent should be diminished or ended. The machinery provided by the Act, and the obligations of the workmen are set out in sec. 11 of Schedule I.—(His Lordship read the section). The words are, "shall . . . from time to time submit himself for examination" by a medical man employed by the employer. These words are imperative. But the respondent has by his own act made it impossible to put that machinery in force. He has left the country. The act does not contemplate in terms the workman leaving the country. But after prescribing the machinery by which the state of the workman is to be ascertained, it enacts (sec. 11): "If the workman refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to weekly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place." I do not think this is a case of the workman refusing, but I think that it amounts to a case of obstructing. It is a reasonable construction of the word "obstruct" to hold that it covers a case where a man by his own acts prevents examination, or, in other words, makes it impossible to have the examination provided for by the Act made. It prevents the operation of the machinery provided by the Act for ascertaining whether the weekly payment is to be continued.

Accordingly I think we should find that the respondent has obstructed the examination, and that his right to the weekly payment is suspended until the examination takes place.

LORD M'LAREN.—This case comes before us in the course of an application by the employers of an injured workman to have the weekly payment awarded to him reviewed, in respect that the workman has gone to Australia, and that the petitioners are unable to exercise their statutory right of having the respondent examined by a medical referee of their own selection. The question is as to the application of section 11 of the First Schedule of the Act, and that is the only point we are called upon to consider. Under section 11 there are, as I had occasion to point out in a previous case,[1] three courses open to the employer, with corresponding obligations upon the workman. (1) The employer may, with his consent, have the workman examined by a medical man selected by the employer himself; (2) the workman may decline an examination by the employer's doctor, and claim to be examined by an official referee; or (3) the workman may agree to examination by the employer's medical referee without being bound by his decision, and if dissatisfied with it he may claim to be examined by an official medical referee. Now, in this case the respondent having left the country, the two latter courses are not available, because there are no official referees outside the United Kingdom to which alone the statute applies, and it is only by putting a severe strain upon the language of the statute that the first course could be made available. I can hardly think that the section contemplates the employer sending a medical man to Australia or instructing an agent in Australia to employ a medical gentleman, of whom he knows nothing, to conduct such an examination. If there was any indication that the Act was intended for the benefit of a workman who goes abroad, it would be necessary to look for some way of working out the provisions of the section, but there is nothing in the principle of the statute nor in its scope to suggest that it was intended to apply to a case of this kind. There is no machinery in the statute appropriate to such a case, and therefore the only safe course is to assume that such a case is not within the statute. I should, if possible, not wish to say that the present case falls within the category of obstruction, though at the same time I think it is clear that "obstruction" does not necessarily mean wilful obstruction. In the absence of any arrangement between the parties it suffices for the decision of the case that the respondent has made it impossible to carry out the provisions of the statute. I therefore agree with all that your Lordship has said, and concur in the judgment proposed.

No. 48.

Dec. 13, 1904. Finnie & Son v. Duncan.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am not disposed to say that a workman cannot go abroad without forfeiting the benefits of the Act, provided he gives notice to his employer, so as to enable some reasonable arrangement to be made for a medical examination in case the employer thinks the weekly payment should be revised. I agree, however, with your Lordship in the chair, that the conduct of the workman in this case has made it impossible to carry out the machinery of the statute, which is provided in the employer's interest. The workman has gone to Australia without notice and without leaving any address, and the employer cannot obtain the medical examination which the 11th section says entitles him to require that the workman shall submit himself to. The workman has made it impossible to carry out the statutory proceedings, and in the plain meaning of the word there has been obstruction in fact. I therefore agree that the case falls within the provisions of section 11, and that in the meantime compensation must be suspended until the medical examination can take place. Whether that involves suspension until the workman comes back to this country, it is not necessary to consider, but until the examination takes place compensation must be suspended. It was not possible for the Sheriff-substitute to diminish or end the award, because he could know nothing of the condition of the workman. He was therefore right in declining to grant the motion as originally made, but I agree that the compensation should have been suspended in hoc statu.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT "having considered the stated case on appeal, and heard counsel for the parties, find that the respondent having left this kingdom for Australia without previous communication with the complainers has rendered it for the present impossible that he should submit himself to examination by a duly qualified practitioner, as provided by the 11th section of the 1st Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as he may be required to do by the subsection, has thereby obstructed his examination, and that in terms of the said subsection his right to further weekly payments from the complainers should be suspended: Find it unnecessary to answer the questions put in the case, and with these findings remit to the Sheriff to proceed."

By the contract the sellers undertook to fit the machine in the buyers' works, and leave it in thorough good working condition. The machine was fitted in March 1901, and, by instalments in the following April and August, the price, with the exception of £1, was paid. 1902 they had frequently intimated their dissatisfaction with the working of the machine, and requested the sellers to put it into proper working order, which the latter had unsuccessfully attempted to do. The buyers had made some unimportant alterations in the machine before rejecting it.

In an action by the buyers against the sellers, concluding for warrant to remove the machine from their premises, and for repayment of the price so far as paid by them, it was proved that the machine had failed to work properly, and that this was due to its inherent defects, and not to any negligence on the part of the buyers or their workmen.

Held that the sellers had failed to fulfil their contract, and that the buyers had timeously exercised their right of rejection.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ON 9th November 1902 Messrs Aird & Coghill, printers, 24 Douglas Street, Glasgow, ordered from Messrs Pullan & Adams, printers' engineers, 15 Margaret Street, Glasgow, a Marinoni printing machine. The contract was concluded by the following letter from Aird & Coghill to Pullan & Adams:—"We have much pleasure in accepting your offer to supply quad royal perfecting duplex Marinoni complete, with moulds, as at present at work at Malcolmsons, Ltd., Redhill. That you alter the flyers and geared inkers, &c., up to date Wharfedale style. The machine to be erected at our works at Douglas Street, and left in thorough good working condition, for the sum of not to exceed one hundred and ninety pounds stg. (£190)."

The machine was delivered in December 1900, and fitted in Messrs Aird & Coghill's works in March 1901, and by instalments of £50 and £100 in April and August 1901, and by crediting Messrs Pullan & Adams with £39, £189 of the price (£190) was paid.

At various dates from November 1901 to July 1902 Messrs Aird & Coghill wrote complaining of the working of the machine, and requesting Messrs Pullan & Adams to put it in good working condition, which they attempted to do.

In July 1902 Messrs Aird & Coghill wrote rejecting the machine, and requesting its removal. Some correspondence followed, in the course of which Mr Pullan, as representing the firm of Pullan & Adams (which had been dissolved), wrote a letter of 7th November 1902, from which the following is an excerpt:—"We cannot do anything else but admit that the machine is not in order when it is broken down. So there is no need for any witnesses about it. Mr 'Adams' positively declines to do anything in the matter, as he is not legally bound. No more am I. Nor the firm of Pullan & Adams. Only I had a feeling when you had found that the machine would not suit your class of work that I would like either to see the machine working to your entire satisfaction or have it removed. Not that I, as before stated, am bound to do anything in the matter: but when you stated that you had discovered that the machine would not suit your purposes, and you would be glad to get rid of it, I was willing to try to comply with your request, as I was to put in the machine, and this at a considerable loss."

Messrs Pullan & Adams having ultimately refused to remove the machine, or to repay the price, in March 1903 Messrs Aird & Coghill raised the present action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the firm of Pullan & Adams, and T. H. Pullan and Thomas Adams, the individual partners thereof.

The prayer of the petition was (1) for warrant to remove the machine from the pursuers' premises, and to sell the same by public roup; and (2) for payment of £150.

No. 49.

Dec. 14, 1904. Aird & Coghill v. Pullan & Adams.

The pursuers, after narrating the contract, made the following averments:—"The defenders, though called upon to do so, have failed to remedy the defects in said machine and to put it in good order and working condition. The machine spoiled all work to which it was applied to such an extent that the pursuers could not use it for their business. The pursuers have never accepted the machine as in fulfilment of the defenders' contract with them, and have rejected it and called on the defenders to remove it."

In their defences the defenders did not expressly deny that the machine had failed to work properly, but averred that its failure was due to the manner in which the pursuers had worked it, and to certain alterations they had made upon it.*

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers having accepted and paid for said machine cannot now reject same. (3) The pursuers' pretended rejection not having been made tempestive, the action should be dismissed, with expenses.

Proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

On 22d February 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in the action Aird & Coghill v. Pullan & Adams that by letter dated 9th November 1900 the defenders contracted to supply the pursuers with a perfecting duplex Marinoni printing machine at a price not to exceed £190, and the defenders undertook to erect the machine at the pursuers' works at Douglas Street, Glasgow, and leave it in thorough good working condition: Finds that the pursuers had inspected the said machine at the works of Malcolmson, Limited, Redhill, near London, but the machine was not then working and was dismantled, and the defenders, after the said inspection, contracted to put it in good working condition at the pursuers' works: Finds that the machine arrived at the pursuers' works in December 1900, and it was erected in March 1901, and the pursuers commenced working with the said machine, but they found it defective on account of its not giving what is called a good register, and the printing appeared slurred, and it was not found to be in good order and condition: Finds that the pursuers from time to time complained to the defenders of the defects in the machine, and the defenders attempted to remedy them, but without success, and after they had attempted to print twelve different jobs, nine of which were defective, they ultimately, in July 1902, requested the defenders to remove the machine and reimburse them for the loss sustained: Finds that while these jobs were being printed the defenders did not object to implement their contract to put the machine in good working condition, but without demur they applied themselves to the remedying of the defects and made additions to and alterations upon the machine from time to time, and in November 1902 they admitted in their letter of 7th November that the machine was not in order, and they made a proposal for repairing the machine and putting it in thorough good working order on payment of their jobbing account, but except on that footing they never offered to make any further alterations on the machine, and they have made no further alterations: Finds that on 20th April 1901 the pursuers paid £50 to account of the machine, and on 17th August 1901 they paid

* The nature and character of the alterations alleged is fully explained in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, infra.

£100 to account of it, and in addition to these payments the defenders have credited the pursuers with the price of certain articles, viz., a guillotine and a hand-press amounting to £39, which three sums amount to £189, and these payments have been appropriated by the defenders to the price of the printing machine, £190, leaving only a balance of £1 due on that machine: Finds that the defenders have failed to prove that the defects in the machine which ultimately led to the machine breaking down were caused by the pursuers driving the machine at a greater rate of speed than it was capable of performing, or that the workmen employed by the pursuers were incompetent and unable to manipulate the machine in a skilful manner: Finds that the real defects in the machine have apparently been caused by the carriage and roller not working in unison, and this has led to defective register and slurring, and the defenders, notwithstanding all their attempts, have been unable to remedy the defects, and they have not implemented their contract to erect the machine in the pursuers' works and leave it in thorough good working condition: Finds therefore that the defenders are in breach of contract, and the pursuers are entitled to have the machine removed and sold as craved: Grants warrant to the pursuers to remove the said machine to the premises of Messrs J. & R. Edmiston, licensed auctioneers in Glasgow, and also grants warrant to such auctioneers to sell the same by public roup, and appoints the proceeds of sale, after deducting the expenses thereof, to be consigned with the Clerk of Court to abide the orders of Court."

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie) adhered.

On 15th July 1904 the printing machine was sold under the order of the Court, and the price (£60, 2s. 6d.) consigned.

On 18th August 1904 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor, whereby he authorised the sum consigned to be paid to the pursuers, and found the defenders, jointly and severally, liable for £66, 5s. 10d.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The pursuers had not exercised their right of rejection timeously. Payment of the price and continued use of the article supplied were inconsistent with rejection.[1] A purchaser was bound either to accept the article and claim damages for the breach of warranty, or to reject it. He must elect between these remedies timeously, otherwise he lost both.[2] The present case was one of undue delay in rejection, and was covered by the decision in Electric Construction Company, Limited, v. Hurry & Young.[3]

The respondents argued;—The defenders had not fulfilled their obligation to erect and leave the machine in good order at the pursuers' works. The pursuers intimated to the defenders their dissatisfaction with the machine from the first, and the delay in rejection was due to the pursuers giving the defenders opportunities for putting the machine right. In these circumstances the machine had been timeously rejected.[3]

ments of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff were right. This machine was ordered for a particular work to be done, and was bought under an agreement whereby the defenders were to put it into and leave it in good order in the pursuers' premises. Now, I think the evidence is quite clear and distinct to the effect that that was never done.

It is quite true that there was a very long time occupied between the time when the machine was first put in and the time when the pursuers rejected it, but during the whole of that time the defenders through Mr Pullan were professing their ability to put matters right, and to bring the machine the pursuers had paid for into such working order that they could not reject it. Time after time efforts were made to put it into working order, and the results were always unsatisfactory; and I think we must take it to be the fact on the evidence (now hardly disputed) that at the time the pursuers gave intimation and rejected the machine, and asked for their money back, the machine, in spite of all the defenders had done, was not in a condition to work properly. It is not a case at all of defects by which the machine breaks or anything of that kind, but it is just this, that the adjustment of the machine—however good the material it is made of—cannot be effected so as to produce the only satisfactory result for which such a machine was intended.

I cannot hold that the time was too long, and that the rejection was not timeous. We were referred to a case[1] in which the time extended to a period of over more than a year, and if the defenders for a time of this length were professing that they were to be able to bring it right, I do not think it is against the pursuers that they gave, time after time, further delay in the hope that the matter might be settled to the satisfaction of both parties.

But, then, it is said that apart from timeous rejection the pursuers have lost right because they altered the machine themselves. I think there is no ground whatever for saying that. It appears that certain cups, which in one part of the evidence are called oil cups—and, I suppose, there must have been oil cups of certain sizes—were taken away, and larger ones substituted. That had nothing to do with the sufficiency of the machine; it may have had something to do with the running of the machine in giving it a better supply of oil; but as to the moving of the machine—which might be lubricated by hand lubricator or any other way—it had nothing to do with that.

Then it is said that the shaft was altered because the engine, instead of being driven by belt as at first, was to be put into connection with an electric motor for the purpose of being driven off the motor shaft direct. All that was done there was, I suppose, to add something to the shaft, so as to enable the motor to be fitted. That was a mere detail, and had nothing to do with the working of the machine. It is what must be expected of a machine when it first comes to a shop in which it was proposed to put it at a particular place—that it might be found that the shafting was slightly too short, and would require to have a piece welded on to it. That does not, in my opinion, in the least affect this question.

On the whole matter of right of the pursuers to reject the machine itself as they did, I do not think it is of the slightest weight that they paid the price at the request of Mr Pullan, who was anxious to get the money. Rights of rejection do not depend on whether the article has been paid for or not. You may reject an article you have paid for on the spot on delivery of the goods, if it turns out that the goods are not conform to the contract.

The only remaining question is the liability of Mr Adams, and with regard to his liability I have no doubt whatever. He was a member of the firm that supplied the machine, and as long as it was a question whether that machine was to be accepted as being in fulfilment of the contract or whether it was to be rejected on the footing that it was not satisfactory, and that some question of damages might arise for the machine not being what it ought to have been, as long as these questions were open Mr Adams, of Pullan & Adams—who were the firm responsible for the final working out of that matter between the parties—was liable. Whatever the transactions the firm had entered into, the partners could not escape from liability for fulfilment of these transactions simply by dissolving the partnership; and it is quite plain that if they dissolved partnership altogether they could not escape, as no partner who leaves the firm escapes liability for those things done under his obligation as a member of the firm.

Therefore on the whole matter I agree with the decisions pronounced.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the Sheriffs are right. The parties here entered into a contract, which is binding on the defenders, to erect a certain machine at the pursuers' shop, and to leave that machine in thorough good working condition. Now, as a matter of fact, I think it has been established, and indeed seems to have been admitted before the Sheriff, that that contract was never fulfilled. The machine never was left in the defenders' premises in good working condition. Accordingly we start the case with this, that the defenders are guilty of a breach of contract, and that the defenders who were guilty of this breach of contract were Pullan & Adams, the then existing firm. If the contract was not fulfilled the buyer had a certain option either to reject the insufficient article that had been furnished or to keep it for what it was worth, and make a claim of damages. In this case he is not making a claim of damages but standing on his right to reject. That right is undoubtedly a buyer's right, but it must be timeously exercised or it will be lost. The defenders maintain that the right has been lost by the pursuers, and there are two particulars I think on which the defenders particularly rely in support of that view.

The first is, that there was payment of price; and the second, that there was too long retention of the machine on the part of the defenders. Now, payment of price may in some cases be an extremely strong element against the person who desires to reject the thing furnished to him as not conform to contract, and I do not know where we could get a better instance of the effect of payment than the case of Morrison[1] cited to us. In that case a defective pump was delivered, accepted, tested, and after testing was paid for. But the payment in that case was equivalent to saying, "You have fulfilled your contract, and I am now to make payment in fulfilment of my obligations under the contract of sale." Now, that could never be said of the payments made here, for these payments by the pursuers were not made under any circumstances indicating that they were satisfied that they were under an obligation to pay the price. We have it ascertained, as a matter of fact, that these payments were made by the pursuers not because they were satisfied, but on the contrary, at a time when they were complaining that the contract had not been fulfilled, and that the defenders were in breach of it. The payments were made, as matter of favour, at the urgent request of the defenders, who were needing money at the time. No inference therefore can be drawn here from payment of the price or part of the price (for only part was paid), to the effect that the parties who paid it were paying it in discharge of an obligation to pay it when they did.

The next objection was that the machine was retained too long. If the machine had been kept as accepted for the period stated, it would certainly have been too late to reject it. But why was it kept so long? From the very outset it was apparent to the pursuers that the contract of the defenders had not been fulfilled, and they called on the defenders time after time to fulfil the contract by putting that machine into thoroughly good working order. The defenders accepted liability for doing that, and they tried to do it month after month, and when the pursuers had lost their patience over these innumerable trials, which were of no avail, they intimated to the defenders that they would wait no longer for the machine. The defenders again asked, "Give us another chance, and we will see what we can do. We are certain that we can put it right." That was done. Well, the thing could not be accomplished. But the reason for the retention of that machine was not to enable the pursuers to make up their mind whether they were to keep it—for it would have been too long a time to retain merely for that purpose—but to enable the defenders to fulfil their obligation.

In these circumstances I think there is no room for saying that there was abandonment on the part of the pursuers of their objections, or any ground whatever from which the defenders could infer that they had accepted the machine as in proper fulfilment of their contract. Accordingly it seems to me that, as against the case on the merits, there is no valid defence stated in this case.

Lord Moncreiff.—We have had a full argument in this case, but I have come to the conclusion, without any difficulty, that the judgments of the Sheriffs are right.

Two questions were put to us—First, whether this machine was conform to contract; secondly, whether looking to the whole circumstances there was an unreasonable delay on the part of the pursuers in rejecting the machine. Now, both these questions must, I think, be answered in the negative.

As to the first question, I think it is clear on the evidence that the machine never at any time was conform to contract. The defenders' counsel contended only in a very half-hearted manner that it was; but on the evidence I think it is quite clear that it was not.

The next question is the only one which, to my mind, raises any kind of difficulty in the case; and that is whether there was unreasonable delay in rejecting the machine. I think the case is exceptional. The delay was great—a year and a half—but the reason for that delay, and the excuse for it, which I think a sufficient excuse, was that the delay was not on the part of the pursuers, but on the part of the sellers of the machine. Under the contract they undertook to erect the machine and leave it in good working order on the premises of the pursuers; and the evidence shews this, that throughout the whole of that year and a half workmen from the defenders, or the defenders themselves, endeavoured frequently to get this machine to work properly and failed to do so.

No. 49.

Aird & Coghill v. Pullan & Adams.

As to payment of the price, that was made at the request of the defenders, and before the delivery of the machine; and in that respect the case differs altogether from the case of Morrison & Mason v. Clarkson and Others,[1] because in that case the machine was delivered in March 1895, tried and found satisfactory, and the pursuer thereafter paid the price on 31st May, while later on he wished to reject it; and I think that very properly it was found that it was too late to do so.

On the whole matter I agree with both your Lordships and the Sheriffs that the decision of the Sheriff should be affirmed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal against the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanark, dated . . . dismiss the appeal, and affirm the said interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the said interlocutor: Of new find that the defenders Pullan & Adams are in breach of contract, and the pursuers Aird & Coghill are not liable for the price of the machine: Further find the parties Pullan & Adams and Thomas Hudson Pullan and Thomas Adams liable to the parties Aird & Coghill in the sum of £66, 5s. 10d. sterling: Of new authorise the consigned money to be paid to the parties Aird & Coghill, and decern against the said Pullan & Adams and Thomas Hudson Pullan and Thomas Adams, jointly and severally, or severally, for payment of said sum to the said Aird & Coghill, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent from the date of citation till payment: Find the respondents entitled to expenses," &c.

night), and not an artificial period made up of twenty-four working hours (i.e., excluding the hours of night).

Ship—Charter-Party—Demurrage—Exceptions—"Stoppage of trains or any cause beyond the personal control" of charterers—Delivery of cargo "as customary."—By a charter-party the ship was bound to deliver the cargo consisting of iron ore "as customary" at the port of discharge where and as directed by the consignees. The charterers were exempt from liability for demurrage in case of delay, inter alia, through "stoppage of trains or any cause beyond the personal control" of the charterers. The time taken for loading and discharging having exceeded the lay-days, the shipowners brought an action for demurrage against the charterers, who pleaded the exemption clause. It was proved that the customary mode of discharging iron ore at Ardrossan, the port of discharge, when the cargo had been sold (as the cargo in question had been), was direct into railway waggons, although in special circumstances the harbour authorities might give permission for part of a cargo being discharged on the quay. It was also proved that delay in discharging the cargo had been caused by the railway company failing to supply a sufficient number of waggons per day. The charter-party took the ship bound to work at night if requested, but the charterers did not request the harbour authorities for permission to work at night.

Held (1) that the customary mode at Ardrossan of discharging a cargo of iron ore which had been sold was into railway waggons direct; (2) that the charterers were not liable for demurrage in respect of ordinary working hours where the delay was caused by want of railway waggons; but (3) that the absence of waggons during the hours of night did not exempt them from demurrage, as the railway company could not be expected to supply waggons at night without notice.

BY charter-party, dated 16th December 1902, William Cruickshank & Company, iron ore merchants, Glasgow, chartered the s.s. "Eastgate" from Turnbull, Scott, & Company, steamship owners, London, the ship to proceed to Aquilas, Carthagena, or Almeria, as ordered by the shippers, and there load a cargo of iron ore, and being so loaded, forthwith to proceed to Glasgow or Ardrossan, and there deliver the same as customary, where and as directed by consignees, to whom notice is to be given of the vessel being ready to discharge, paying for discharge one shilling per ton. . . . The cargo to be shipped at the rate of 500 tons per working day of twenty-four consecutive hours (weather permitting), Sundays and holidays always excepted; and to be discharged on same conditions. (Except in the case of strikes of miners or workmen, accidents or stoppages caused by frost at any mine or mines from which shippers may receive part or whole cargo, epidemics, riots, insurrections, quarantine, stoppage of trains, interventions of sanitary, customs, and other constituted authorities, or any cause beyond the personal control of shippers, charterers, or consignees, which may hinder the loading or discharge of the said vessel.) In these cases lay-day hours not to count and demurrage not to accrue. Days to be averaged to avoid demurrage. In case charterers can arrange to load or discharge ship on Sundays or holidays, captain to allow work to be done, half such time to count. Time not to count at port of discharge between the hours of 5 P.M. on Saturdays and 7 A.M. on Mondays, unless used. Loading time to count from 6 A.M. after ship is reported at Custom-House and ready, unless work should have commenced earlier, and for discharging when ship is in every respect ready in berth, and in free pratique, as per custom of port; written notice of such readiness being given to consignees during usual office hours. The ship to unload barges sent alongside with all possible dispatch (should this mode of shipping be used); and captain to be responsible for any delay incurred by not doing so. Ship to work day and night, if requested to do so, and to give use of winches, with necessary steam power and hands, charterers paying all extra expenses. Ship to keep the steam winches in good working order. Demurrage (if any) at the rate of 16s. 8d. per hour."

The "Eastgate" proceeded to Aquilas, as directed by Cruickshank & Company, and there loaded a cargo of iron ore. She then proceeded to Ardrossan, where she discharged.

In June 1903, Turnbull, Scott, & Company brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against Cruickshank & Company, for decree for £80, 8s. 4d. as demurrage incurred in respect of the "Eastgate."

(1) The first question raised was as to the meaning of the clause in the charter-party—"The cargo to be shipped at the rate of 500 tons per working day of twenty-four consecutive hours (weather permitting), Sundays and holidays always excepted, and to be discharged on same conditions."

The pursuers maintained that a "working day of twenty-four consecutive hours" meant a day of twenty-four actually consecutive hours, i.e., a day in the ordinary sense, so that every hour counted (Sundays and holidays excepted) from the time that the vessel was ready to load or to discharge in terms of the charter-party until the completion of loading or discharging.

The defenders, on the other hand, maintained that "a working day of twenty-four consecutive hours" meant an artificial period of twenty-four hours in each of which the work of loading or discharging was usually performed, the hours of night being thus regarded as non-existent.

The cargo of the "Eastgate" amounted to 2241 tons of ore, and this, at "500 tons per working day of twenty-four consecutive hours," brought out eight days twenty-three hours for loading and discharging combined. According to the pursuers' method of calculation therefore, the lay-days extended to eight days twenty-three hours with the addition of Sundays and holidays. According to the defenders' method of calculation, on the other hand, the lay-days extended, roughly speaking, to twice eight days twenty-three hours in actual time.

(2) If the time taken for loading and discharging exceeded the lay-days (which on the pursuers' method of calculation admittedly it did) the question arose as to the defenders' liability for demurrage.

The defenders averred;—(Ans. 6) " . . . Explained that, in accordance with the charter-party, the vessel was to deliver the cargo at Ardrossan as customary; that the custom at Ardrossan is to discharge iron ore into trucks. Explained that the delay, if any, which occurred at Ardrossan arose from want of trucks or other cause beyond the personal control of the charterers. Explained that besides the custom above averred the charter provides"—(The defenders then quoted the clause of exceptions in the charter-party). "The causes of the delay are exceptions within the charter-party. . . . Denied that it is customary at Ardrossan to discharge iron ore on to the quay. Explained that in any case there was no quay space available on which to discharge the cargo in question, and it was never suggested to the defenders or their representatives that the cargo, or any part of it, should be discharged on to the quay. Both parties to the contract understood that the cargo was to be discharged into trucks direct, and acted accordingly."

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 6) " . . . Explained that it is customary at Ardrossan to discharge iron ore not only into trucks, but also on to the quay, and that there were ample trucks and quay space available to have discharged the 'Eastgate' within the lay-days."

A proof was allowed and led. The evidence was to the following effect:—

The iron ore forming the cargo of the "Eastgate" was sold to James Dunlop & Company, Limited, of the Clyde Iron Works. The delay in discharging at Ardrossan was due to the Caledonian Railway Company (by whose line Dunlop & Company directed the ore to be forwarded) supplying only a restricted number of waggons per day. Where a cargo of iron ore had been sold the custom at Ardrossan was to discharge it direct into railway waggons. Where a cargo of iron ore had not been sold it might be discharged on to the quay, provided that there was room and the harbour authorities gave permission; and even in the case of a cargo that had been sold it occasionally happened that after the bulk of the cargo had been discharged into trucks, the remainder was discharged on to the quay, if there was a scarcity of waggons, in order to let the vessel away. The matter of discharging on to the quay was mentioned incidentally in the course of conversation between Captain Evans, the master of the "Eastgate," and Mr Craig, the traffic superintendent of the Harbour Company, but no request was made to discharge the cargo of the "Eastgate" on to the quay. There was a conflict of evidence between Captain Evans and Mr Craig as to whether there was room on the quay at the time for the cargo of the "Eastgate"—Mr Craig deponing that there was not, Captain Evans that there was. The customary hours of working at Ardrossan were from 6 A.M. to 6 P.M., but occasionally for special reasons ships discharged during the night. The defenders did not make any request to be allowed to discharge during the night.

On 6th April 1904 the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) that the defenders chartered the steamship 'Eastgate' from the pursuers, as per charter-party, No. 25 of process, to proceed to Aquilas, there load a cargo of iron ore, and, being so loaded, to proceed to Ardrossan, and there deliver the same as customary; (2) that the charter-party provided, inter alia, as follows"—(The material clauses of the charter-party were then set forth); "(3) that the said ship duly proceeded to Aquilas in terms of the charter-party, and there loaded a cargo of 2241 tons of iron ore, and that the time occupied in loading was six working days of twenty-four consecutive hours each; (4) that the ship reached Ardrossan on Thursday, 22d January 1903, and was ready to discharge cargo on Friday, 23d, at 10 A.M., and that the discharge of cargo was finished at 10.30 A.M. on Saturday 31st January; (5) that the total time occupied in discharging the cargo was six working days of twenty-four consecutive hours each and ten and a half hours, and that the total time occupied in loading and discharging was eighty-three and a half hours in excess of the time stipulated in the charter-party; and (6) that the detention of the 'Eastgate' beyond the lay-days specified in the charter-party is not proved to have been due to any of the causes enumerated in the charter-party as exceptions to the charterers' liability to pay demurrage: Finds in law that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in demurrage at the rate of 16s. 8d. per hour for the said period of eighty-three and a half hours, amounting to £69, 11s. 6d.: Therefore decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £69, 11s. 6d., with interest at the rate of five per cent per annum from 3d June 1903: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—This is an action by shipowners against charterers for payment of demurrage, and the first point in dispute between the parties is as to the meaning of the provision in the charter-party,—'The cargo to be shipped at the rate of 500 tons per working day of twenty-four consecutive hours (weather permitting), Sundays and holidays always excepted, and to be discharged on same conditions.' The pursuers submit that the words 'consecutive hours' are used in their ordinary sense, and that, excepting Sundays and holidays, each period of twenty-four consecutive hours elapsing after loading or discharging should have begun must be reckoned as a working day in terms of the clause. The defenders, on the other hand, maintain that the meaning of 'working day of twenty-four consecutive hours' is working day of twenty-four consecutive working hours, and that non-working hours of working days—that is, hours during which, in accordance with the custom of the ports of loading or discharging, work did not proceed—were not to be counted as part of the 'twenty-four consecutive hours,' which go to make up each 'working day.' I am of opinion that the construction put upon the clause by the pursuers is the right one. It appears to me that the defenders' construction denies all proper effect to the word 'consecutive.' I cannot read 'consecutive hours' as equivalent to consecutive working hours, or as meaning anything else than hours following one another immediately and without interval of time. This construction is entirely consistent with the other provisions of the charter-party as to the time to be allowed for loading and discharging, and, it may be added, with the interpretation which the defenders themselves put upon the charter-party while the contract was being carried out, as is shewn by the letters from the defenders to John Craig, Captain Evans of the 'Eastgate,' and the pursuers' agents, Robert Mackill & Company, dated respectively January 24th, January 27th, and February 13th, 1903.

"In support of their contention the defenders founded on the case of Rhymney s.s. Company v. Iberian Ore Company, 79 L. T. 240, affirmed sub nomine The Forrest s.s. Company v. Iberian Ore Company, 16 T. L. R. 59, but there is a material difference between the terms of the charter-party in that case and this. In the first place, the words which had there to be construed were 'working day of twenty-four hours,' and not as here 'working day of twenty-four consecutive hours.' In the second, the charter-party in that case, after providing that the ship was to work at night if required, provided further that such time was not to count unless used, which in effect limited the 'working day' in the ordinary case to the hours usually worked, whereas here the charter-party, while providing that the ship is to work at night if requested, does not contain the further provision that the time is not to count unless used, except in regard to the period between 5 P.M. on Saturday and 7 A.M. on Monday, and the fair inference is that hours not worked on working days were intended to count whether used or not. . . .

"The next point to be ascertained is what time was occupied in loading and discharging the ship. It is admitted that six lay-days—that is, six working days of twenty-four consecutive hours—were occupied in loading, and it is not matter of controversy that the ship was ready to discharge cargo on Friday, 23d January, at 10 A.M., and that the discharge was completed on Saturday, 31st January, at 10.30 A.M. The time therefore occupied in unloading, omitting the time which, in terms of the charter-party, was not to count, namely, from 5 P.M. on Saturday, 24th January, to 7 A.M.

No. 50.

Dec. 15, 1904.
Turnbull, Scott, & Co. v. Cruickshank & Co.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—(1) The lay-days had not been exceeded; consequently demurrage had not been incurred. A "working day of twenty-four consecutive hours" meant a conventional day made up by piecing together twenty-four hours, during each of which there had been or ought to have been work, i.e., the hours of night were not counted. That was the interpretation put upon a substantially similar clause in the Forrest s.s. Company[1] by the Court of Appeal in England, and by the House of Lords. It was said that that construction gave no effect to the word "consecutive." But "consecutive" merely meant that no proper working hours were to be omitted; it could not mean that there were not to be any breaks once the lay-days had begun to run either at the port of loading or at the port of discharge, for there were in the first place the breaks caused by Sundays and holidays; and in the second place there were possible breaks caused by the exception clause coming into operation.

on Monday, 26th January, was six days ten and a half hours, and the total time occupied for loading and discharging twelve days ten and a half hours, being eighty-three and a half hours in excess of the time allowed by the charter-party.

"The only remaining question is whether the detention of the ship beyond the stipulated time was due to any of the causes specified in the charter-party as exceptions to the defenders' obligation to pay demurrage. The defenders submit that it was, and it is for them to establish this. They contend that, by the terms of the charter-party, the cargo was to be delivered 'as customary'; that this provision is to be read into the clause of exceptions; and, therefore, that they are exempt from liability, if by reason of any of the excepted clauses they were prevented from discharging the cargo in the customary manner within the stipulated time. They allege that, by the custom of the port of Ardrossan, iron ore is discharged into railway trucks, which was the mode of discharge they adopted, and that the detention of the ship was due to the insufficiency of the supply of waggons given by the Caledonian Railway Company. This, they say, was within the meaning of the clause of exceptions a 'stoppage of trains,' or, at anyrate, 'a cause beyond the personal control of the charterers' hindering the discharge of the ship.

"In considering this argument, I assume that the defenders would, as they contend, not be liable for the detention of the ship beyond the time stipulated, if, owing to any of the excepted causes, its discharge 'as customary' within that time was rendered impossible. But, even making this assumption, I am of opinion that it is not enough for the defenders to shew that the mode of discharge which they adopted, namely, into trucks, was the most usual method of discharging iron ore at Ardrossan. They must, I think, shew further that it was the only mode of discharging ore recognised by the practice of the port, which it was within their power to adopt. They bound themselves to load and discharge the vessel at a certain rate per day, and the clause of exceptions only frees them from liability for failure to fulfil their engagement if the impediment arising from the excepted cause be one hindering the discharge of the ship, and I do not think the insufficiency of the waggon supply could be regarded as such an impediment, if they could have resorted to another method of discharge recognised by the custom of the port, although not so commonly used or so convenient as that which they adopted.—Granite Steamship Company v. Ireland & Son, 19 R. 24.

"It is necessary, therefore, to inquire whether there was any other mode

The hours of night were also an implied exception. The clause "ship to work day and night if requested" shewed that night work was abnormal. The pursuers' construction gave no meaning to the word "working." They read the clause just as if it had been "day of twenty-four consecutive hours." The clause "days to be averaged to avoid demurrage" meant that all the working hours were to be added together, and the total divided by twenty-four. (2) If the pursuers' construction of "working day of twenty-four consecutive hours" was adopted, the defenders did not dispute that the lay-days had been exhausted before the ship was unloaded at Ardrossan. The defenders, nevertheless, were not liable in demurrage, for they were within the exception clause in the charter-party. The delay was due to a "cause beyond the personal control of the charterers," namely, to scarcity of railway waggons.[1] The defenders did not dispute that the

of discharging ore than into trucks recognised by the custom of the port of Ardrossan, and on this point the result of the evidence is clear, and I do not think it necessary to examine it in detail. On the one hand, it is clearly proved that much the most usual method of discharging ore at that port is into trucks, but on the other, it is proved just as clearly that, if quay space is available, the Harbour Company are glad to allow it to be put on the quay, and that this is a recognised method of discharging ore at the port when necessity arises, although it is not generally adopted except where a cargo arrives which has not been sold, or in the case of a sold cargo, where there is a special desire to get the ship away, and its departure can be accelerated by discharging part of its cargo in this manner. It is true that only a small proportion of the total iron ore brought to Ardrossan is discharged on to the quay, and that most of the witnesses who speak to the point deny that it is the customary method of discharge, but all, I think, admit that it is a known method permitted by the harbour authorities, which can be resorted to in cases of emergency, and in this state of the evidence I am unable to hold that the method in question is not in accordance with the custom of the port. It is quite possible that there should be more than one customary method of discharging cargo at a port, and where the charterer's obligation is to discharge 'as customary,' his engagement will not, in my opinion, be fulfilled unless he use all the usual methods of dispatch.

"The defenders further argued that in the case of the 'Eastgate' the cargo could not have been put on the quay, because there was no quay space available at the time, but I do not think they succeeded in proving this. The only witnesses to the point are Captain Evans of the 'Eastgate,' and Mr Craig, who took charge of the unloading of the ship. Captain Evans states that there was ample room on the quay alongside the ship to accommodate the cargo. Mr Craig's recollection is to the contrary, but it is certain that no application was ever made by the charterers to have the cargo put there, and that being so, I cannot regard Mr Craig's evidence, founded as it is upon his recollection of the condition of the quay at a time more than a year past, and contradicted, as it is, by that of Captain Evans, as proving that there was no room on the quay for the 'Eastgate's' cargo.

"I was referred by the defenders to the cases of Wyllie & Co. v. Harrison & Co., 13 R. 92, and Letricheux & David v. Dunlop & Co., 19 R. 209, in which charterers were held not liable for detention arising from an insufficient supply of railway trucks, but I do not think these cases are applicable as authorities in the present case, as in neither was there any method of discharge available except that which was adopted, viz., into trucks. . . ."

general clause of exception just quoted included only causes of delay ejusdem generis with those specifically mentioned; but scarcity of waggons was ejusdem generis with "stoppage of trains." The discharge was to be "as customary." It was proved that delivery into trucks was the only customary method of discharge at Ardrossan, and was therefore the only method that the defenders were bound to adopt.[1] Even if discharge on to the quay was a customary method of discharge at Ardrossan it could not have been adopted in the present instance, since there was no room on the quay. The defenders were entitled to deduct all the hours of night as well as of day, during which the work of discharging was impossible owing to the want of waggons, and these hours being deducted no demurrage was due.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) "Working day of twenty-four consecutive hours" meant a day in the ordinary sense. The defenders' construction gave no meaning or effect to the word "consecutive." The presumption was that days in a charter-party meant running days, i.e., days in the ordinary sense. The evidence shewed that it was usual to work at Ardrossan at night, or at least outside the ordinary working hours (from 6 A.M. to 6 P.M.). Work at night was treated as normal in the charter-party since no special rate of remuneration was provided. "Days to be averaged to avoid demurrage" meant that the time occupied in loading the cargo was to be added to the time occupied in unloading cargo, and the resulting number of hours divided by twenty-four, i.e., that broken days were not to be treated as whole days. (2) The exceptions clause did not apply. Want of waggons was not ejusdem generis with stoppage of trains, which included only stoppage en route. The delay was caused by the failure of the defenders to discharge on to the quay in the absence of railway waggons.[2] "As customary" referred to the mode of loading and unloading, e.g., whether by crane or into lighters, and not to the mode of removing.[3] The proof shewed that discharge on the quay was a customary mode of discharging at Ardrossan. In any view, the defenders were not entitled to deduct the hours of night. They had not made any demand for waggons at night.

There was also argument (and evidence) on the question whether the scarcity of waggons must be held to have been due to the fault of the defenders in respect that the Caledonian Railway Company had refused a full supply of waggons to James Dunlop & Company, Limited, on account of the overcrowded state of Dunlop & Company's works; or otherwise, in respect that the defenders ought to have obtained waggons from another railway company.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The parties to this case are practically agreed, or nearly agreed, on all the facts which are material. They differ in regard to the construction to be put on the clauses of the charter-party, which provide (1) for the lay-days allowed the charterers for loading and discharging cargo, and (2) for the exceptional circumstances which absolve the charterers from liability for demurrage.

1. The charter-party provides that the cargo is to be loaded and discharged "at the rate of 500 tons per working day of twenty-four consecutive hours, weather permitting. Sundays and holidays always excepted." The Sheriff-substitute has stated in the note to his interlocutor appealed against the interpretation which the parties respectively put upon this clause, and has done so with such clearness and precision that it is quite unnecessary for me to repeat what he has so well said. He is of opinion that the view contended for by the pursuers is the right one, and I agree with him. It was argued by the defenders that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was in conflict with the decision pronounced in the case of the Forrest s.s. Company,[1] a decision they maintained which was favourable to them, and pronounced in a case not distinguishable from the present. But I think, with the Sheriff-substitute, that that case is distinguishable. In it the provision was that the cargo should be loaded and discharged at a certain rate "per working day of twenty-four hours," and that was interpreted to mean not twenty-four consecutive hours but twenty-four working hours. That decision was not arrived at without hesitation (and was dissented from by one Judge), but of course I take it as a just construction of the instrument then under consideration. But the very difficulty which in that case stood in the way of the pursuer's success has been removed in the present case by the unambiguous language of the contract. The working day is said to be a day of twenty-four consecutive hours, and in each of such days 500 tons of cargo was to be loaded or discharged. In the clause before us there is the exception that hours when the weather did not permit of loading or discharging were not to be reckoned against the charterers, nor were holidays nor Sundays. But in every twenty-four consecutive hours from the commencement of the loading or discharging, 500 tons were to be loaded or discharged if the weather did not hinder it or a holiday or Sunday intervene. And in my opinion the words "working day" in the clause before us are used only in antithesis to the days which were Sundays or holidays.

2. On the second question I differ from the Sheriff-substitute. The charterers are taken bound to discharge the cargo at the port of destination "as customary," and are not to be liable for demurrage where delay in the discharge is occasioned by, inter alia, "stoppage of trains . . . or any cause beyond the personal control" of the charterers. I take it as proved that the customary mode of discharging ore (such as the cargo in question) at Ardrossan is to discharge it into railway trucks or waggons brought alongside or nearly alongside of the ship. To discharge such a cargo on the quay is not customary, although sometimes comparatively small quantities of ore are under special circumstances allowed by the harbour authorities to be so discharged. If it were necessary to the decision of the question before us I should hold it established—and this I think is the only fact regarding which the parties are at variance—by the best evidence (that, namely, of Mr Craig, the superintendent of Ardrossan harbour) that, to use his own words, "There was no room to put any of the 'Eastgate' cargo on the quay." The Sheriff-substitute scarcely does justice to this evidence, which he says is not corroborated, overlooking the fact that the captain of the "Eastgate" admits that Mr Craig told him practically the same thing as stated by him in evidence. But I do not think it necessary to say whether there was room for the cargo of the "Eastgate" on the quay or not. It was to be discharged "as customary," and that I think the evidence clearly shows was into railway trucks. That being so, the question arises, what was it that delayed the discharge, and the answer to that question is given by the captain of the "Eastgate"—"My evidence comes to this, that after the first day the delay was caused through want of trucks so far as I know." This is also proved by other witnesses. The pursuers maintain that "want of trucks" is not within the excepted causes of delay, and this leads me to notice the terms of the clause of exception. If I read that clause in its broadest and most literal sense I should hold that it exempted the charterers from liability for demurrage if the delay in discharging the cargo arose from any cause whatever over which they had not "personal control." It might fairly be read as excluding liability in any and every case except where the delay arose from the neglect or fault of the charterers. But I am willing to read the clause in a more restricted sense, and to hold that the general words of exemption with which the clause concludes must be limited to causes not under the charterers' control which are ejusdem generis with those causes specified. Even then I think the clause must be read as the defenders contend it should. One of the specified causes is "stoppage of trains," and it appears to me that want of railway trucks is ejusdem generis with that. Stoppage of trains just means the want of railway accommodation for taking and carrying the ore to the consignee; the want of trucks is practically the same thing. If there were no trucks to receive the cargo, then the train of which they would have made a part if not the whole was stopped. The conveyance of the ore by trains was necessarily stopped if there were no trucks to make the train. In my opinion, therefore, the defenders are not liable for demurrage for the delay occasioned by the want of trucks, and to this extent I think the present appeal should be sustained. The hours, however, which are not to be charged against the charterers do not, in my opinion, include more than the hours of the ordinary working day during which trucks were usually supplied, but when, in point of fact, they were not supplied. The defenders say that the hours of night when no trucks were available should also be deducted. I think not. If the charterers had asked for trucks at an unusual hour (wishing to work night and day), and had been refused them, there would have been something to say for their contention. But this is not the case. The hours of the night, therefore, are not to be deducted from the pursuers' claim. The parties applying these views to the facts of the case will be able to fix the amount for which the pursuers are entitled to decree.

Lord Moncreiff.—At the close of the debate it appeared to me that the Sheriff was right upon the first point and wrong upon the second. On the first point, that is, as to the proper mode of ascertaining the time to be allowed for loading and unloading under the charter-party, I agree with and adopt the reasons given by the Sheriff.

No. 50.

Turnbull, Scott, & Co. v. Cruickshank & Co.

On the second question, however, I cannot agree with him. I think it is proved—(1) that the customary mode of discharging a sold cargo at Ardrossan was to discharge it into waggons. (2) That it was only in an emergency that any part of a cargo of ore was allowed to be put and remain on the quay, and that in order to get this done the ship had to arrange with the charterer and also with the harbour authorities. (3) That through no personal fault of the charterers there were not sufficient trucks forward to receive the cargo. And lastly, that the balance of the evidence is in favour of the view that on the occasion in question there was no room on the quay for the cargo. John Craig, the traffic superintendent of the Ardrossan Harbour Company, says this distinctly; and although Evans, the master of the "Eastgate," says that there was room on the quay for the cargo, he admits that, in his conversation with Craig, Craig said that there was too much on the quay already, and he does not say that he suggested to Craig that the cargo should be landed on the quay.

In regard to the insufficiency of trucks, it is sufficient to refer to the cases of Letricheux v. Dunlop,[1] and the recent case in this Division "The Lady Palmer."[2]

I understand that with findings to the above effect the parties will have no difficulty in ascertaining how the accounts stand between the ship and the charterers.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor dated 6th April 1904 appealed against: Find in fact in terms of the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th findings in fact set forth in said interlocutor: Find further in fact (1) that the lay-days allowed by the charter-party for loading and discharging the cargo in question amounted to eight days and twenty-three hours; (2) that the loading and discharging of said cargo occupied twelve days and ten and a half hours, being three days and eleven and a half hours in excess of the said lay-days; (3) that of that excess one day and one and a quarter hours was caused by the want of trucks into which the said cargo had to be delivered: Find in law—(1) that on a sound construction of said charter-party the defenders are not liable for demurrage for any delay to the discharge of said cargo occasioned during the currency of the lay-days by the want of trucks; (2) that the defenders are liable to the pursuers for demurrage at the stipulated rate of 16s. 5d. per hour for a period of two days and ten and a quarter hours, which amounts to the sum of £48, 10s. 10d. sterling: Therefore decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of said sum of £48, 10s. 10d. with interest as concluded for: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in the Sheriff Court and in this Court, but as regards the latter only to two-thirds of the same as taxed," &c.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

ON 21st January 1904 David Murray Maxtone, assessor for the county of Argyll, brought an action against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Dunoon for payment of £57, 7s. 4d.

Dunoon was a police burgh, in the county of Argyll, which did not return or contribute to return a member to Parliament, and consequently under the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900, secs. 26 and 27,* the duty of preparing the municipal register of voters for the burgh fell on the pursuer as assessor for the county.

The sum sued for comprised (1) remuneration for work done by the pursuer in making up the municipal register of voters for the burgh for the years 1902-1903 and 1903-1904; and (2) outlay incurred by him in connection with this work.

Sec. 27. "On or before the 15th day of September in each year the assessor for any burgh and for any portion of a county included within the municipal boundary of any burgh shall prepare a separate list of" peers and females entitled under sec. 23 to vote at municipal elections, "which list shall form the supplementary list."

indebted to him in the amount of the reasonable charges for said services and the amount of said outlays, decree as concluded for ought to be pronounced.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The pursuer being bound, under the said Town-Councils Act, to perform the duties for which he claims payment, and his services being covered by his salary as county assessor, and there being no obligation imposed on police burghs to pay him any special fee therefor, the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) The pursuer not having a contract with the defenders, and not being entitled to demand remuneration or recover outlays from them, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On 2d August 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders are not bound to remunerate the pursuer for his services in making up the municipal register of the burgh of Dunoon, but that they are bound to repay to him the necessary and proper expenses which he has incurred in making up the said register: With these findings appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure, reserves the question of expenses, and grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.—By the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900, certain duties are laid upon the assessor for the county in which a burgh not returning a member to Parliament is situated, in regard to making up a municipal register of voters. By the 67th section of the Act it is provided that 'the whole expense of making up and printing the municipal register, and in connection with the election of councillors and magistrates,' shall be defrayed out of the common good, or out of certain assessments, or shall be apportioned between them. There is nothing said in the Act as to the remuneration of the assessor for his labour and trouble in making up the register.

"The pursuer is assessor for the county of Argyll, and the defenders are the Town-Council of the burgh of Dunoon, which is a police burgh situated in that county. The pursuer has, as assessor for the county, performed the duties in the way of making up the municipal register of Dunoon imposed upon him by the Act, and he now sues the defenders for remuneration for his services and for payment of certain outlays incurred by him.

"In regard to the outlays, assuming that they have been properly and necessarily incurred, I do not think that there can be any doubt that they fall in terms of the 67th section to be paid out of the common good or the assessments referred to in the section, and as the defenders have the administration and control of the common good and the assessments, I think that the pursuer is entitled to sue them for payment of outlays which he has made on their behalf in the performance of his statutory duty.

"The question of remuneration, however, is in a different position. The pursuer did the work because it was imposed upon him by statute, and not because he was employed by the defenders to do it. The pursuer therefore cannot claim remuneration from the defenders on the ground of contract. Nor, in my opinion, is there any statutory obligation laid upon the defenders to remunerate the pursuer for his services. The statute imposes the duty of making up the municipal register upon the county assessor, but says nothing whatever about his remuneration, and I think that it is impossible to read into the Act by implication a provision that he shall be remunerated for his labour in making up the register by the Magistrates of the burgh.

"The pursuer founds upon the 67th section, but I do not think that its provisions aid him. What the section deals with is the 'expense' of making up the register, and I do not see how remuneration to the assessor can possibly be included in the expression 'expense' unless some one is under a Maxtone v. Magistrates of Duncon.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer was entitled not only to his outlays, but also to a reasonable sum as remuneration for his services. Section 67 of the Town-Councils Act, 1900, imposed on the burgh not only the "whole expense" of printing but also of "making up" the municipal register, and the words "making up" would be almost, if not entirely, meaningless if they did not include the remuneration of the assessor, for that was practically the only item of expense in making up as distinguished from printing the register. The county assessor, who was removable at pleasure,[1] might, under section 40 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856,[2] be compelled by the burgh to perform his statutory duty of making up the burgh register; he was therefore quoad that roll the servant of the burgh, and entitled to remuneration out of the burgh funds. The fact that "expense" was not in terms declared to include the assessor's remuneration was not adverse to the pursuer's claim; there were cases in which such remuneration was held to be included, although it was only by implication,[3] and the fact that "expense" was expressly declared to include the assessor's remuneration in the Registration of Voters Act, 1856,[2] sec. 43, and in the County Voters Act, 1861,[4] sec. 41, really told in favour of the pursuer, as shewing how the Legislature defined "expense" in matters of this description. Besides, these sections of the Acts of 1856 and 1861 were incorporated in the Town-Councils Act, 1900.[5] This was not the case of an official of a public body, e.g., a town-clerk[6] with a fixed salary, having extra work imposed on him by statute, for the public body under whom he acted, without anything being said in the statute as to legal obligation to pay such remuneration. But the defenders (with whom alone this case is concerned) are, as I have shewn, under no obligation, either statutory or contractual, to remunerate the pursuer.

"I may add that I am confirmed in the view which I have expressed by comparing the Act of 1900 with other Acts whereby similar duties have been laid on assessors. Thus, by the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Act of 1856 the assessors in burghs are directed to make up registers, and it is provided (section 43) that after the completion of each annual register the magistrates shall fix the amount of the costs and expenses thereof, 'including therein any remuneration to assessors which they may deem proper.' Similar provisions are contained in the County Voters (Scotland) Act, 1861. I think that those Acts shew that when the Legislature intended assessors to be remunerated for such work express provision was made to that effect, and that when in the Act of 1900 no provision was made for remuneration it was because it was not intended that the assessor should receive any additional remuneration beyond his salary as county assessor.

"I may also refer to the English cases of Jones v. Carmarthen (Mayor), 8 M. and W. 605, and Queen v. Governors of the Poor of Hull, 2 Ellis and Blackburn, 182."

remuneration; it was the case of the official of one public body—the County Council—doing work for another public body—the burgh, with which he was otherwise entirely unconnected. It would be ultra vires of the County Council to remunerate the pursuer for this work.[1] The English cases to which the Lord Ordinary referred were decided upon other statutes.

Smith, K.C., for the defenders, stated that they acquiesced in the Lord Ordinary's judgment as regarded liability for outlays.

The argument for the defenders on the question of liability for remuneration to the pursuer sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case arises under the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act of 1900. By that Act the making up of the register of municipal voters in the smaller burghs, which are not separately represented in Parliament as burghs, is ordered to be performed by the assessor for the county in which any such burgh is situated. The County Assessor of Argyllshire, having been required to make up the roll of Dunoon, maintains in this action that he is entitled to payment from the burgh for his work in doing so. The claim he divides into two parts—the necessary outlays incurred by him in having the work done, and remuneration to himself for the work done by him. As regards the first I think that the Lord Ordinary has rightly held that the pursuer's outlays must be paid, and against this finding the defenders do not reclaim. But he has held that there is no ground in law for subjecting the burgh funds in payment of the pursuer's services. My opinion is that he has rightly so held. The pursuer has done the duties for which he now asks payment by appointment of the statute, which has laid this work upon him. He is ordained to do it, and the burgh has no choice in the matter, but must allow this public duty to be done by him and by no one else. He can certainly therefore have no claim against the burgh as upon a contract of service. It is therefore only by appeal to the statute that the pursuer can establish any claim to receive remuneration for work in obedience to statutory requirement. Now, I do not find any authority in the statute for compelling the burgh to make such payment. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that section 67 cannot be read as conferring any right upon a county assessor fulfilling this statutory duty to demand payment for the work. "Expenses" incurred is one thing, payment for work is another.

It is certainly consistent with if not directly confirmatory of this view that in other statutes where new duties have been imposed upon those holding official appointments, and where it was thought right that there should be additional remuneration in respect of them, this was expressly dealt with by statutory enactment. The decision in the case of The Queen v. Allday[1] seems also most apposite.

My opinion is that the Lord Ordinary has rightly disposed of the case, and that his interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I cannot say that the interpretation put by the pursuer on the clauses of the Act on which he bases his claim is unreasonable. On the contrary, that clause seems to me quite capable of being read as including within "the expense of making up" the municipal register a fair remuneration to the officer who makes it up. But the considerations against that view stated by the Lord Ordinary are at least as strong against the pursuer's contention as anything which occurs to me in favour of it. I cannot therefore say that I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor wrong, but I assent to the judgment now proposed with some hesitation.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Although this may be rather a hard case for the pursuer, I am not prepared to differ from the Lord Ordinary. The pursuer's claim depends entirely upon whether the words in the 67th section of the Town-Councils (Scotland) Act, 1900, "the whole expense of making up and printing the municipal register," &c., include remuneration to the pursuer, the Assessor for the County of Argyll, for his personal services in making up the municipal register as well as the necessary and proper expenses connected with the making up and printing the register, which admittedly must be defrayed by the burgh of Dunoon.

If this question had arisen for the first time, and we had no guidance from decision or from analogous provisions in other Acts of Parliament, I should have been disposed to hold that the expense of making up the register included suitable remuneration to the person upon whom the duty of making it up was laid by the statute. But the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken, that "expense" does not include remuneration to the pursuer, is confirmed by the decision to which he refers—The Queen v. Governors of Poor of Hull.[2] It is also confirmed by the provisions of other Acts of Parliament—in particular, the Registration of Voters Act of 1856, sec. 43, which expressly provides for remuneration to assessors and town-clerks respectively connected with the completion of the annual registration, and the corresponding provision in the County Voters (Scotland) Act of 1861, sec. 41.

The case therefore stands thus—the Town-Councils Act of 1900, sec. 26, has laid upon the county assessor the duty of making up the municipal register, and the statute does not provide for any additional remuneration, as distinguished from the outlays, being paid to him for the performance of that duty. The duty thus laid upon the county assessor does not appear to be very onerous, and many instances could be given in which officials have had extra work laid upon them by statute of a much more onerous description in respect of which no additional remuneration is given.

I am far from saying that the imposition of this extra work upon the county assessor may not furnish him with a good reason for asking the County Council to increase his salary; but that is a matter for arrangement between the County Council and the assessor.

Bankruptcy — Right in Security — Illegal Preference — New security granted in substitution for prior invalid security — Custody of security subject — Constructive Delivery—Stoppage in transitu — Transference of document of title for valuable consideration and in good faith—Act 1696, c. 5—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 47.—In June 1903, Neilson lent £3000 to M'Dowall & Company, and in security took from M'Dowall & Company delivery-orders for timber belonging to them stored in Connal & Company's timber-yard. The orders were in favour of Neilson, and were addressed to Haggart & Company, licensed timber-measurers, employed by M'Dowall & Company to measure and store the timber. The orders were intimated by Neilson to Haggart & Company, who replied acknowledging that they held the goods to his order. The duties of Haggart & Company in regard to storing timber were to measure it, to stack it in the yard selected by their employers, by whom they were paid, and to arrange for its removal when sold. The yard belonged to Connal & Company, by whose servants it was watched, and by whom books were kept in which were noted the quantities of the timber stored and the names of the owners, who paid rent for storage. According to the practice of the timber trade in Glasgow, the measurers were allowed by the proprietors of the yard to have practically complete control over timber stored by them. They could remove the timber as and when they chose, and delivery-orders for the removal of timber were addressed to them.

On 23d September 1903, Neilson at the request of M'Dowall & Company granted delivery-orders signed by him and addressed to Haggart & Company in favour of M'Dowall & Company for the timber in exchange for the bills of lading of a cargo of timber purchased by M'Dowall & Company from Dobell, Beckett, & Company, then on its way to Glasgow. On the arrival of the cargo at Glasgow four days later, it was stopped in transitu by Dobell, Beckett, & Company. On 1st October M'Dowall & Company were sequestrated.

In a question between Dobell, Beckett, & Company, and Neilson, held (1) that the delivery-order addressed to Haggart & Company by M'Dowall & Company, and duly intimated to them by Neilson, did not operate as constructive delivery of the timber to Neilson, Haggart & Company being the servants of the granters of the order and not independent custodiers of the timber; (2) that Neilson therefore had not a valid security at the date when the bills of lading were transferred to him, and that the transfer was struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5.

Held further, that the undertaking by Haggart & Company to hold to Neilson's order, surrendered by him when he received the bills of lading, not being an obligation granted by them personally, but only as the servants of M'Dowall & Company, was of no value, and was not "valuable consideration" in the sense of the Sale of Goods Act, 1894, sec. 47, and that the stoppage in transitu was not affected by the transference of the bills of lading to Neilson.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

ON 11th June 1903, John Birkmyre Neilson, warehouseman, Glasgow, lent to M'Dowall & Neilson, timber-brokers, the sum of £3000, and in security took delivery-orders for certain lots of timber belonging to M'Dowall & Neilson, lying in the timber-yards owned by Connal & Company, and by the Clyde Navigation Trustees. The delivery-orders were in favour of John Neilson, and were addressed to Haggart & Company, timber-measurers, Glasgow, who had been employed by M'Dowall & Neilson to measure and store the timber and to superintend its removal. The orders were sent by John Neilson to Haggart & Company, who acknowledged them by a letter dated 19th June 1903, bearing:—"We have your letter of yesterday enclosing delivery-order in your favour from Messrs M'Dowall & Neilson for the following wood goods, viz. . . . which we now hold to your order."

On 22d September 1903, M'Dowall & Neilson asked John Neilson to release the timber for which he held said delivery-orders, in exchange for the bills of lading of a cargo of timber which had been purchased by them from Dobell, Beckett, & Company, timber-merchants, Quebec, and was on its way to Glasgow. John Neilson agreed to do so, and signed delivery-orders in favour of M'Dowall & Neilson, addressed to Haggart & Company, and the bills of lading, were accordingly indorsed to him on 23d September.*

At the date of this transaction, M'Dowall & Neilson were in fact insolvent. On 25th September they closed their office, and on 1st October their estates were sequestrated. Robert Reid, C.A., Glasgow, was appointed trustee.

The ship containing the cargo of timber arrived in Glasgow on 27th September, and, immediately on its arrival, the agents of Dobell, Beckett, & Company having learnt of M'Dowall & Neilson's insolvency, served upon the master of the ship a notice that they stopped the goods in transitu, and required him to deliver the timber to them as unpaid sellers, which he did.

Questions having arisen regarding the cargo of timber, which was claimed by Dobell, Beckett, & Company as unpaid sellers, by John Neilson in security of his loan, and by Robert Reid as trustee on the sequestrated estates of the purchasers, the present action was raised by Dobell, Beckett, & Company, against John Neilson and Robert Reid. The summons concluded, inter alia, for declarator (1) that the pursuers were entitled to stop, and did validly and effectually stop, in transitu the cargo of timber sold by them to M'Dowall & Neilson; (2) that the pursuers, as at the date of the stoppage in transitu, had a valid lien on the timber for the sum of £2592, 5s., being the price at which they sold the same to M'Dowall & Neilson, and that neither of the defenders had any right or title to demand delivery or to claim possession of said goods or the proceeds thereof except upon payment of said price; (5) that M'Dowall & Neilson were at the time when the bills of lading were indorsed and transferred by them to the defender John Neilson, or at least within sixty days of the date of said indorsation or transfer, insolvent and notour bankrupt in terms of the Statute 1696, c. 5; (6) that the indorsation of the bills of lading by M'Dowall & Neilson, and the transfer thereof by them to the defender John Neilson, were null and void, and of no effect or validity. There was also a conclusion for reduction of the transference of the bills of lading to John Neilson.

* M'Dowall & Neilson's letter of 23d September to John Neilson was in the following terms:—"Dear Sir—In consideration of (first) your handing to us delivery-orders addressed to Messrs Haggart & Company, timber measurers and contractors, Glasgow, for the following timber, viz.:— . . . for all of which we gave you delivery-orders addressed to Messrs Haggart & Company in security of a loan of £3000 which you gave us on 11th June 1903; and (second) of your continuing the said loan to us of £3000 on getting other security in place of the timber for which you have now given us delivery-orders, we now send you herewith"—four bills of lading.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers being unpaid sellers of goods to buyers who became insolvent, were entitled to stop said goods in transitu, and having validly stopped them in transitu, decree of declarator ought to be pronounced in terms of the first and second conclusions of the summons. (3) The transfer of said bills of lading executed by M'Dowall & Neilson having been granted during insolvency and without valuable consideration, or otherwise for the purpose and to the effect of creating an illegal preference in favour of the defender John Birkmyre Neilson, is void, aut separatim ought to be reduced in terms of the conclusion for reduction. (6) The defender John Birkmyre Neilson is not entitled to found upon the indorsations of said bills of lading in respect that they are contrary to the Act 1696, c. 5, and are void and null, or alternatively ought to be reduced.

John Neilson pleaded, inter alia;—(6) The said bills of lading having been lawfully transferred by the pursuers to M'Dowall & Neilson as buyers, and transferred by them to this defender, who took the same in good faith and for valuable consideration, any right of lien or stoppage in transitu available to said sellers can only be exercised subject to this defender's rights.*

On 24th May 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Low) allowed a proof, which was led on 28th June. The result of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, infra.

On 20th July the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the first, second, fifth, and sixth declaratory conclusions of the summons: Finds, reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the reductive conclusions thereof: Finds that it is unnecessary to dispose of the conclusions of the summons quoad ultra: Dismisses the same, and decerns," &c.†

* The Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 47, enacts:—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, the unpaid seller's right of lien or retention or stoppage in transitu is not affected by any sale, or other disposition of the goods which the buyer may have made, unless the seller has assented thereto.

"Provided that where a document of title to goods has been lawfully transferred to any person as buyer or owner of the goods, and that person transfers the document to a person who takes the document in good faith and for valuable consideration, then, if such last mentioned transfer was by way of sale, the unpaid seller's right of lien or retention or stoppage in transitu is defeated, and if such last mentioned transfer was by way of pledge or other disposition for value, the unpaid seller's right of lien or retention or stoppage in transitu can only be exercised subject to the rights of the transferee."

† "OPINION.—I shall first consider the question which is raised in this case between the pursuers and the defender John Birkmyre Neilson.

"The circumstances are as follows:—John Neilson is a brother of Arthur

The defenders reclaimed.

Argued for the defender John Neilson;—The bills of lading were acquired by the defender in good faith and for valuable consideration, and the pursuers' rights of stoppage in transitu could only be exercised subject to the rights of the defender as transferee.* The transference of the bills of lading to the defender by M'Dowall & Neilson was not a transaction struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5, the documents in question having been acquired in substitution for a prior equivalent security, namely, the delivery-orders addressed to Haggart & Company.[1] These orders constituted a good and complete security, or at least—which had the same effect in a question under the Act of 1696[2]—one which could have been completed by the defender without the intervention of M'Dowall & Neilson. The transference of the delivery-orders to the defender operated constructive delivery in his favour, and thereafter the timber was held by Haggart & Company on his account, and not on that of M'Dowall & Neilson. Neilson, who was the only member of the firm of M'Dowall & Neilson, timber-brokers, Glasgow. In June 1903 Arthur Neilson asked John Neilson to lend him £3000. Arthur Neilson had been speculating largely and unsuccessfully upon the Stock Exchange, and was at the time insolvent, although he managed to carry on business until the 25th of September following. He did not disclose his financial condition to John Neilson, although he told him that he required the loan on account of losses upon the Stock Exchange. Arthur Neilson said that he would give timber security for the loan. John Neilson had not so large a sum available at the time, so he applied to Mr Woodrow—a brother-in-law of Arthur Neilson—who agreed to find the money, and handed £3000 in cash to John Neilson, who in turn paid it to Arthur Neilson on the 11th of June. There seems to have been an arrangement between John Neilson and Mr Woodrow that they would divide any loss which there might be between them; but that is a matter which is not of any importance in this case. After he received the money Arthur Neilson sent delivery-orders in favour of John Neilson to Haggart & Company, timber-measurers in Glasgow, for certain lots of timber which were lying in the timber-yards of Connal & Company and of the Clyde Navigation Trustees. I shall explain presently why these delivery-orders were sent to Haggart & Company and not to the owners of the timber-yards. The face value of the timber included in the delivery-orders was £3343. From time to time, between 11th June and 23d September, Arthur Neilson wished to dispose of portions of the timber for which he had given delivery-orders to John Neilson, and upon these occasions he got a delivery-order for the parcel of which he wished to dispose, and in lieu thereof gave to John Neilson a delivery-order for another parcel of approximately equal value. All the delivery-orders were addressed to Haggart & Company.

"On 22d September Arthur Neilson through his salesman, Fraser, asked John Neilson to release timber to the face value of £2802 in exchange for the bills of lading of the cargo of wood which is in question in this case, and the value of which was stated to be £2599. After consulting Mr Woodrow and his law-agent, John Neilson agreed to exchange his delivery-orders for the wood in the timber-yards for the bills of lading. John Neilson admits that Fraser told him that his brother was in financial difficulties, and the latter paid off his employees and shut his office on the 25th Sepcording to the custom of trade in Glasgow, Haggart & Company were independent custodiers of the goods, and the case was distinguishable on the facts from that of Anderson,[1] referred to by the pursuers, where the goods remained in the possession of the debtor and in the custody of his paid servants. The owners of the yards were the custodiers if Haggart & Company were not, and the latter, in superintending and controlling the removal of the timber, were acting as their agents. In any event, the personal obligation of Haggart & Company, expressed in their acknowledgment to the defender that "we now hold the goods to your order," constituted a separate security, which was surrendered by the defender in exchange for the bills of lading, and was "valuable consideration" in return for which the bills of lading were acquired. If Haggart & Company, while holding the timber to the order of the defender, had parted with it without his permission, he would have had recourse against them personally. There tember, his estates and those of his firm being sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts on the 1st of October.

"The bills of lading were therefore indorsed to John Neilson within sixty days of the bankruptcy of Arthur Neilson and his firm, and the pursuers, as creditors of M'Dowall & Neilson, seek to have the transaction set aside on the ground that security for a prior debt was thereby voluntarily given.

"Whether the pursuers are entitled to succeed or not seems to me to depend upon whether John Neilson had a good security over the timber for which he held delivery-orders, because if the security was good, there was no illegality in his exchanging it for another security.—Roy's Trustee v. Colville & Drysdale, 5 F. 769.

"The delivery-orders, as I have said, were addressed to Haggart & Company, timber-measurers. That arose in this way. If the consignee of timber arriving in the Clyde desires to store it, he employs a measurer, whose duty is to measure the timber and see it properly stacked in the yard selected by his employer. The yards are enclosed, and the gates are kept and the yard watched by the servants of the proprietors of the yard. The stacking of the timber appears to be done by the men employed by the measurer, but the part of the yard in which the stack is to be placed is pointed out by the superintendent. An entry is made in the books of the yardkeeper of the number of stacks, the cubic feet in each stack, and the name of the timber-merchant for whom the timber is stored. A note also appears to be taken of timber removed from time to time, but as the rent is regulated, not by the size of the stack, but by the ground which it covers, the important removal, from the yardkeeper's point of view, is the last when the ground is left vacant, and that is the only removal to which he pays much attention.

"The rent is paid by the merchant on whose behalf the timber is stored by the measurer, and if a change of ownership of the timber is intimated to the yardkeeper, he charges the rent thereafter against the new owner. The fees and charges of the measurers are paid by the merchants by whom they are employed.

"After the timber is stored, the measurer—who must hold a licence from the Clyde Trustees—has, so far as the storekeeper is concerned, practically complete control over it, and he is allowed to remove timber which he has stored and when he chooses. A practice accordingly appears to have sprung up of addressing a delivery-order to the measurer in the event of timber which is stored being sold, and the measurer either takes the timber out of the yard and delivers to the purchaser, or if the latter desires it to continue in was no evidence that the defender had acquired the bills of lading in bad faith.

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers' rights of stoppage and lien were not affected by the transference of the bills of lading to John Neilson, as that transaction was null and void under the Act of 1696. The delivery-orders given by him in exchange for the bills of lading were no security at all. No such security could exist until the goods were delivered, either actually or constructively, to him. They were not actually delivered, and constructive delivery could only take place when they were in the custody of some person (other than the owner) to whom the delivery-order could be addressed.[1] In the present case the goods de facto remained in the custody of the proprietors of the timber yards, and M'Dowall & Neilson could at any time have resumed possession.[2] Haggart & Company were not independent custodiers, but merely the agents for M'Dowall & Neilson, and the transference to John Neilson of the delivery-orders addressed to Haggart & Company did not operate constructive delivery to him.[3] He could not store, the measurer intimates to the yardkeeper the name of the purchaser, who is thereafter liable for the rent.

"Although a delivery-order addressed to the measurer may be a very convenient course to follow in the case of timber in store being sold, it does not follow that it is a competent method of constituting a security. That depends upon whether the measurer is an independent custodier of the goods not identified with the owner who is granting the security.

"It was argued for John Neilson that the measurer was practically custodier of the goods, as he had full control over them, and that in receiving delivery-orders and removing and distributing the timber, he was truly acting as agent for the yardkeeper, who would otherwise require to employ a servant for that purpose.

"I do not think that the measurers, Haggart & Company, were the custodiers of the timber. The timber had been put in the keeping of the Clyde Trustees and Connal & Company for M'Dowall & Neilson and by their instructions, and Haggart & Company were allowed complete control of the timber in the way of moving it from the yard, not because they were custodiers, but because they represented and had the authority of M'Dowall & Neilson.

"But even if Haggart & Company were in a sense the custodiers of the timber, I am of opinion that a delivery-order addressed to them was ineffectual to operate constructive delivery of the timber, because they were the servants of M'Dowall & Neilson.

"It was M'Dowall & Neilson who instructed them to measure the timber and to store it on their behalf; it was M'Dowall & Neilson who paid the measurers or to whom they looked for payment; and the measurers were allowed control over the timber in the yard, not because they were the custodiers or the servants of the custodiers, but because they were the accredited agents of M'Dowall & Neilson. Further, I think that it is plain that if M'Dowall & Neilson had dispensed with the services of Haggart & Company and employed another measurer to look after the timber in store, the yardkeeper would, upon receiving intimation of such change, have been bound to see that Haggart & Company did not thereafter interfere with the timber.

"Now, it is well settled that in order to operate constructive delivery of goods by a delivery-order, the custodier to whom the delivery-order is have completed his security within sixty days of M'Dowall & Neilson's bankruptcy by obtaining possession of the goods through the delivery-orders, as delivery in such circumstances would have been struck at by the Act of 1696.[1] In any event the defender could not take advantage of the proviso in section 47 of the Sale of Goods Act, as he did not acquire the bills of lading either for valuable consideration or in good faith. The undertaking by Haggart & Company to hold the timber to his order was of no more value than an undertaking by M'Dowall & Neilson themselves, Haggart & Company, as agents for disclosed principals, not being personally responsible for their actings. Further, in taking the bills of lading without inquiry at a moment when any inquiry would have informed the defender of M'Dowall & Neilson's financial position, he had not acted in "good faith" as defined by the Sale of Goods Act.*[2]

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary, and have nothing to add to the opinion he has expressed. There were, however, two points raised in the debate before us regarding which the Lord Ordinary has expressed no opinion, and on them I desire to say a few words. The first of these points was maintained by the defenders (the reclaimers), and was to this effect: That assuming no effectual security had been constituted by the delivery-orders intimated to Haggart & Company, and that therefore the right conferred by the indorsed bills of lading within sixty days of bankruptcy was not the substitution of one good security for another previously existing, yet the defender gave a valuable consideration for the bills of lading, and so brought himself within the terms of the 47th section of the Sale of Goods Act. The valuable consideration on which the defender here relies was, according to the argument, this—the personal obligation by Haggart & Company to hold the goods referred to in the delivery-orders for behoof of the defender, which obligation the defender discharged or surrendered by taking the bills of lading in exchange for those goods. It addressed must be independent of the granter of the order, and if, although he is custodier of the goods, he is also in the employment of the granter, there will be no delivery.—Anderson v. M'Call, 4 Macph. 765.

"I am therefore of opinion that delivery-orders addressed to Haggart & Company did not operate constructive delivery to John Neilson. If, however, that view is sound, then John Neilson never had a security over the timber—he had at most his brother's obligation to grant a security. Therefore when the bills of lading were indorsed to John Neilson, the only tangible consideration for the transfer was the prior debt, and the transaction was accordingly, in my judgment, one which was struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers, being creditors of the bankrupts, are entitled to have the transaction set aside." (His Lordship then proceeded to consider the questions raised between the pursuers and the defender Reid, which, in substance, were identical with those raised in the case reported ante, p. 35.)

is no doubt true that when the delivery-orders were intimated to Haggart & Company they, in acknowledging receipt, stated that they held the goods "to your order"—that is, the order of the defender. But the judgment of the Lord Ordinary holding that the intimation of the delivery-orders to Haggart & Company was ineffectual to transfer, by constructive delivery, the goods to the defender, proceeds upon the ground (as I think rightly) that Haggart & Company were not independent custodiers of the goods, but only the servants, agents, or representatives of M'Dowall & Neilson as the owners. If, therefore, in receiving the delivery-orders Haggart & Company were only acting as the agents or representatives of M'Dowall & Neilson, their acknowledgment of the same and their obligation to hold to the order of the defender must have been granted in the same character. They had no other. Their obligation as agents (for known principals) bound their principals and not themselves. It follows that the obligation which the defender says he surrendered was the obligation of his debtors M'Dowall & Neilson, which was not a valuable consideration for the bills of lading in the circumstances which existed. Accordingly, in my opinion, this contention on the part of the defender cannot be given any effect to.

The other point was one maintained by the pursuers. They said that the defender was excluded from the benefit of any privilege conferred by the section of the Act I have referred to, in respect that he was not in bona fide when he took the bills of lading, knowing as he did (or might have known) that M'Dowall & Neilson were then insolvent. I am not prepared to sustain this view or to affirm that the defender was not acting in good faith. When he went to consult his law-agents with regard to the subject of exchanging what he then regarded as his valid security over the goods in the Clyde Trustees' yard, for the indorsed bills of lading, I am disposed to think he was desirous of being advised as to the character and extent of the right which an indorsed bill of lading conferred. He explains in his evidence that he had never previously had any transactions based upon an indorsed bill of lading, and he desired information, as I have said, as to the value of such a thing as a security. His law-agent said something about what "if anything happened within sixty days." Now, I quite believe the defender when he says that he did not understand what this allusion to the Act of 1696 meant or imported. That being so, I cannot hold bad faith in any way imputable to the defender, and I have thought it right, so far as my opinion goes, to clear him of any such imputation. The result, however, of my opinion is that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed.

Lord Moncreiff.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. The pursuers, who are timber-merchants in Quebec and London, in February and August 1903, sold certain quantities of timber to M'Dowall & Neilson, and in part execution of their contracts in September 1903 shipped at Quebec and Montreal four lots of timber mentioned in the summons, the price of the lots amounting to £2592, 5s. On 18th and 22d September the pursuers' agents in Glasgow sent to M'Dowall & Neilson one set of bills of lading for the said timber, accompanied by two incomplete bills of exchange for the acceptance of M'Dowall & Neilson, and on 24th September the bills of exchange were returned accepted but unstamped.

Dobell, Beckett, & Co. v. Neilson.

On 23d September M'Dowall & Neilson handed to John Birkmyre Neilson the four indorsed bills of lading and immediately afterwards became bankrupt, their estates being sequestrated on 1st October 1903.

The pursuers, having ascertained that M'Dowall & Neilson were insolvent, refused to deliver the cargo to John B. Neilson on its arrival at Glasgow, on the ground that they were unpaid sellers, and that they were entitled to stop it in transitu and hold it in security of the price.

1. The bills of lading having been delivered indorsed to John B. Neilson on the eve of the bankruptcy of M'Dowall & Neilson, the indorsation is reducible at the instance of the pursuers unless John B. Neilson can shew that in exchange for the bills of lading he gave up to the bankrupts' firm a security of equal value which he had obtained more than sixty days before their bankruptcy. That question depends upon whether John B. Neilson had at the date of the indorsation of the bills of lading a completed right in security over certain timber belonging to M'Dowall & Neilson which was then standing in the keeping of the Clyde Trustees and Connall & Company; and that again depends upon whether intimation to Haggart & Company operated constructive delivery of the timber to John B. Neilson. I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that it did not, because Haggart & Company were not independent custodiers of the goods, but were in the employment of M'Dowall & Neilson. The only difference between the present case and Anderson v. M'Call [1] is that while in the latter case the store belonged to the granters of the transfer note, although not at the place where they carried on business, in the present case the store or yard in which the timber was placed did not belong to M'Dowall & Neilson, but to the Clyde Trustees and Connall & Company. This difference, however, I think is immaterial, because both in the case of Anderson [1] and in the present case the delivery-order was sent to a storekeeper in the employment of the granters, and not to an independent custodier.

I am therefore of opinion that when John B. Neilson received the indorsed bills of lading on 23d September 1903, he held no valid security over the said timber which he could give in exchange for the bills of lading; consequently he received the bills of lading without value, and simply in further security of his advances to M'Dowall & Neilson.

Again, if Haggart & Company were simply servants of M'Dowall & Neilson, they cannot be held by their acknowledgment of receipt of the delivery-order to have given any personal obligation to John B. Neilson.

If these views are correct, it is not necessary to consider whether John B. Neilson took the bills of lading in mala fide. I think it clear that on 23d September he knew that M'Dowall & Neilson were on the brink of bankruptcy; but it is fair to assume that he thought that he was giving up a valid equivalent security.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Schedule, sec. 14—Compensation—Setting off expenses against weekly payment.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, enacts (Schedule 1, sec. 14),—"A weekly payment, or a sum paid by way of redemption thereof, shall not be capable of being assigned, charged, or attached, and shall not pass to any other person by operation of law, nor shall any claim be set off against the same."

Held that an employer, who had been found liable in a weekly payment under the Act to a workman, could not set off against that payment a sum awarded to him as expenses against the workman in an application for the diminution of the weekly payment.

2D DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

THIS was a suspension by the Rosewell Gas Coal Company, Limited, of a charge against them at the instance of Daniel M'Vicar, miner, Kelty. The following narrative of the facts in the case is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney):—

"M'Vicar suffered injury on 12th April 1902 and on claiming compensation before the Sheriff the parties agreed on a weekly sum of 15s. 8d.; and a memorandum of the agreement was registered under the Workmen's Compensation Act on 7th January 1903. Proceedings were taken by the Rosewell Company under the provisions of the Act for diminution of the weekly rate of compensation. These proceedings were at first unsuccessful, and on 30th May 1903 the application of the Rosewell Company was dismissed, and the Company was found liable in expenses, which were taxed at £5, 15s. 6d. But on a second application by the Rosewell Company the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor dated 10th October 1903, by which the weekly compensation was reduced to 10s. 8d. from 3d July 1903. By this interlocutor, which is printed on the record, the Rosewell Company were found entitled to one-half of their expenses, which half amounted, as taxed, to £13, 4s. 1d. There was thus a balance of expenses due to the Rosewell Company of £7, 8s. 7d.

"The complainers have paid the compensation of 15s. 8d. until 3d July 1903, and have since paid the reduced compensation to 30th October 1903.

"They then intimated to M'Vicar that they would withhold payment of the compensation until the balance of expenses due to them had been paid, and payment has not been made since that date. A sum of 10s. 8d. a week from 30th October 1903 to 31st March 1904 would amount to £11, 13s. 2d., and that sum has been consigned with the Accountant of Court. At that date M'Vicar charged the Rosewell Company for payment of £11, 13s. 2d., and the Rosewell Company presented this note of suspension."

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The said charge should be suspended, in respect . . . (b) that the complainers are not due to the respondent the sum charged for; and (c) that the respondent is barred personali exceptione from insisting in his claim until he has paid the said expenses incurred to the complainers in connection therewith.

On 26th July 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds, in respect of the 14th article of Schedule 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, that the complainers' claim for expenses cannot be set off against the weekly payment found due by them to the respondent: Therefore repels the complainers' objections to the charge by the respondent: Refuses the prayer of the note, and decerns." *

The complainers reclaimed, and argued that expenses awarded in the course of the proceedings were in an exceptional position, and that a plea of set off based upon them was not barred by section 14 of Schedule 1.[1]

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am very clearly of opinion that the judgment reclaimed against is right.

The object of the Act is to secure that an injured workman shall have for his subsistence the sum awarded to him, and that it is not to be trenched upon in any way. This is made perfectly clear by section 14 of the First Schedule.

* "OPINION.—(After stating the facts ut supra, and dealing with an objection to the regularity of the charge)—The other point is of more consequence and of general application. It raises this question under the Workmen's Compensation Act—whether, when a workman has obtained an award, an action to recover the amount awarded can be met by a decree against him held by his employers when it is a decree for expenses awarded in the course of the proceedings for compensation.

"I think this point is determined by the 14th article of the First Schedule of the Act, which provides expressly that 'a weekly payment, or a sum paid by way of redemption thereof, shall not be capable of being assigned, charged, or attached, and shall not pass to any other person by operation of law, nor shall any claim be set off against the same.'

"I think that the last words of this article cannot be got over. They seem unambiguous, and to meet the case precisely. I do not say whether the Sheriff-substitute could or could not have framed his allowance of expenses in such a way as to make them a deduction from the compensation. I do not see that he could. At all events he has not done so, although I am informed he was asked to do so. The reasons of suspension must therefore be dismissed."

Dec. 16, 1904. Houldsworth v. School Board of Cambusnethan.

In 1858, by disposition bearing to be granted under the authority of the School Sites Act, H., a fee-simple proprietor, conveyed to certain persons as trustees four acres of land "to be applied as a site for a school for the district of . . . for children of the labouring, manufacturing, and other poorer classes . . . and for a residence for the teacher or teachers, and for no other purposes whatever." A school was erected. In 1903 the trustees closed the school, and intimated that they were no longer able to maintain it. The heir of H. brought an action against them, concluding for declarator that the site had reverted to him.

The trustees did not defend the action, but (1) the local School Board, and (2) certain residents in the locality, parents of children of the class for which the school was intended, were allowed to lodge defences, and they maintained that the school should be conveyed to the School Board.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy, Ordinary) (1) that the provisions of the School Sites Act were incorporated in the trust, although the site granted exceeded one acre, and (2) that the pursuer was entitled to decree (per Lord Trayner and Lord Moncreiff, the Lord Justice-Clerk concurring) on the ground that the irritancy provided by the Act had been incurred—per Lord Young on the ground that, apart from the Act, the property of the trust reverted to the donor because the trust purposes had failed, and no legitimate scheme for the use of the property for analogous purposes had been suggested.

Opinions that the School Board had no title to intervene in the action.

Opinions that the individual residents had a title to intervene, but no interest to oppose the decree, in respect that their only interest in the matter was to secure free education for their children, and that such education was provided by statute. Opinion (per Lord Young) that they had no title to intervene.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Kyllachy.

BY feu-charter, dated the 11th day of September 1858, Henry Houldsworth, at that time heritable proprietor of the estate of Coltness, on the narrative that the Coltness Iron Company were then in the course of erecting a school for the district of Newmains, in the parish of Cambusnethan, for children of the labouring, manufacturing, and other poorer classes therein, and a residence for the teacher thereof, and that they had applied to him to grant a piece of ground as a site therefor, gave, granted, and disponed to and in favour of James Hunter, one of the partners of the said Company, and his heirs and successors whomsoever, a piece of ground extending to about four acres, which it was further declared was to be "possessed and applied as a site for the foresaid school and residence, and for no other purposes whatever."

On 13th September 1858 Mr Hunter, by disposition bearing:—"I, James Hunter, . . . freely and voluntarily do hereby, under authority of an Act,* passed in the fifth year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, entituled an Act to afford further facilities for the conveyance and endowment of sites for schools, and of all other Acts enabling me herein, sell, alienate, and dispone from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of . . . and . . . being four of the resident inhabitants of the parish of Cambusnethan in which the said school is situated, and being heads of families, and to such other person or persons as may be hereafter assumed to act along with them and me, in virtue of the powers hereinafter inserted as trustees for the said Act, All and Whole . . . to be applied as a site for a school for the district of Newmains in the said parish for children of the labouring, manufacturing, and other poorer classes, of and in the said parish or the vicinity thereof, and for a residence for the teacher or teachers in the said school, and for no other purposes whatever." The disposition was recorded in the New General Register of Sasines on 17th September 1858 in terms of the School Sites Act, 1841, sec. 10.

The trustees acting under the disposition above mentioned built a school on the site conveyed, which was carried on until June 1903. when, after intimation to the School Board of the parish of Cambusnethan, it was closed. It had been maintained partly by fees, partly by Government grant, and partly by contributions from the Coltness Iron Co.

The present action was raised by James Hamilton Houldsworth, proprietor of the estate of Coltness, grandson and heir-at-law of the late Henry Houldsworth, and by the representatives of the said James Hunter, against the trustees under the Newmains School Trust. The conclusion of the action was, inter alia, for declarator that the whole right, title, and interest in the said piece of land conveyed in 1858 had reverted to the first named pursuer, and now belonged to him. There were also conclusions for adjudication of the said piece of land to him.

The trustees did not defend the action, but minutes were lodged for the School Board of Cambusnethan and David Brownlie and others, residents in the district of Newmains. On 12th May 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, by which, under reservation of all questions as to the minuters' title and interest, he allowed them to lodge defences to the action.

The pursuers, after narrating the deeds above mentioned, made the following averments with regard to the history and existing state of the school:—(Cond. 7) "The school was closed for summer holidays on 26th June 1903, and the trustees were unable to re-open it. On 7th July 1903, they had received intimation from the Coltness Company that their contributions would terminate on 1st August 1903, and intimation thereof was made on 9th July to the School Board. The trustees have all along provided the means for the carrying on of herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding." Section 10 declares that a conveyance of any site for a school, under the Act, in a form therein given, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit, being executed with a testing-clause, and being recorded within sixty days of the date thereof in the General Register of Sasines or Particular Register for the county in which the lands or heritages lie, shall, without actual seisin, be valid and effectual in law to all intents and purposes, and shall be a complete bar to all other rights, titles, trusts, interests, and incumbrances, to, in, or upon the lands or heritages so conveyed.

the school, for which the fees and the Government capitation grant were found insufficient, out of the funds provided for this purpose by the Coltness Company. Accordingly, they have now become merely holders of the site without having the necessary funds with which to carry out the purposes in trust for which the site is vested in them."

The defenders averred that the disposition by Mr Hunter, dated 13th September 1858, was not in the form prescribed by section 10 of the School Sites Act, 1841. They also averred that the School Board of Cambusnethan were willing, and had offered, to carry on the school in terms of the disposition by Mr Hunter.

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for—(1) In respect that the subjects in question were and are held by the defenders under the feu-charter and disposition mentioned in the condescendence solely for the purpose of being used and applied for the foresaid school and residence, and for no other purposes whatever; and they have now ceased to be so used and applied; (2) in respect that the said provision in the defenders' title with regard to the use of the said subjects is a material and essential condition of, and real burden on, the same; (3) in respect that under the provisions of the School Sites Act of 1841, which is incorporated in the defenders' title, the subjects in question, on ceasing to be used for the said purposes, revert in property to the pursuer the said James Hamilton Houldsworth. 2. The minuters, the School Board of the parish of Cambusnethan and others, have no title or interest to appear to oppose the conclusions of the summons. 3. Separatim, the defences lodged for the minuters, the School Board of the parish of Cambusnethan and others, are not relevant.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—3. The pursuers' averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. 4. The purpose for which the ground was conveyed not having failed, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. 5. The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. 6. In any event, the provisions of the School Sites Act are inapplicable, in respect that the ground greatly exceeds one acre in extent.

On 12th July 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, whereby he declared and adjudged in terms of the conclusions of the action.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers in this case are (1) Mr J. H. Houldsworth, who is proprietor of the estate of Coltness and heir of the late proprietor, Mr Henry Houldsworth; and (2) the testamentary trustees and heir-at-law of the late Mr Hunter of Auldhouseburn, who was a partner with the late Mr Houldsworth in the Coltness Iron Company.

"The object of the action is to have it declared that a certain piece of ground, forming the site of a school and schoolmaster's house, erected in 1858 by the Coltness Iron Company, has ceased to be used and applied for the purpose for which it was granted by the pursuers' authors, and has thereby reverted, in terms of the title, to the pursuers, and in particular to the pursuer Mr Houldsworth. The title consists of (1) a feu-charter by the late Mr Henry Houldsworth to his partner, the late Mr Hunter; and (2) a disposition substantially of even date bearing to be granted by Mr Hunter, in terms of the School Sites Act of 1841, in favour of certain trustees who, so far as surviving, are called as defenders to the action. These trustees it appears consider that they have no good defence to the action, and accordingly they have not entered appearance. But a minute of compearance,

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The compearing defenders were entitled to appear and defend. The individual defenders were the beneficiaries under the trust, and were entitled to intervene to prevent what they held to be a breach of the trust.[1] The School Board had also a title to appear, just as they were entitled to appear in a scheme for the alteration of an educational trust.[2] (2) The School Sites Act, 1841, did not apply to the case, and therefore the pursuers could not take advantage of the irritancy therein contained. The Act was excluded because (a) the disposition was not in the statutory form, (b) it applied only to sites not exceeding one acre, (c) the original conveyance by Mr Houldsworth, whose heir now proposed to enforce the irritancy, did not bear to be granted under the Act. If so, the pursuers had no case at common law. Even if the having been lodged by the School Board of the parish, and certain concurring parishioners, I—perhaps not quite regularly—allowed these compearers to lodge defences, and (without deciding anything as to their title) allowed a record to be made up. Upon that record I had the other day a general argument in the Procedure-roll. The immediate question is whether the compearers have made out a title to intervene. But in considering that question it is difficult to avoid trenching on the merits.

"The position of the compearing defenders seems to be this: They say that this is an educational trust; that the trustees who are called as defenders are committing a breach of trust in not defending the action; and that they, the compearers, having an interest in the educational arrangements of the parish, and being therefore, as they say, beneficiaries under the trust, have a title to interpose and maintain certain defences which the trustees, as they (the compearers) contend, wrongfully, refuse to maintain.

"In the view which I take of the case it may (for shortness) be as well to assume that the defenders have a sufficient title to raise and argue this question of breach of trust; and perhaps on that assumption the best course may be to take the case as if the trustees were maintaining the defences which it is said they ought to maintain, and to see whether and how far these defences are well founded.

"The suggested defences are (1) that under the title there is no effective provision for the reversion of the site to the donor, even on the assumption that the school has been discontinued; and (2) that assuming the contrary, the school has not in fact been discontinued,—at all events discontinued in circumstances on which the pursuers can found.

"It does not appear to me that either of those defences could have been maintained by the trustees with any hope of success.

"As to the terms of the title, it is quite true that in the original feu-charter there is no express clause of irritancy; and it may be, that without such express clause, no forfeiture of the feu is possible for breach, even of the most express conditions affecting its use. But the case is different with respect to the disposition by Mr Hunter, which constituted the trust, and conveyed the subjects to the trustees. That disposition bears to be and is a statutory disposition under the Act of 1841, and of course incorporates by reference all the conditions and provisions expressed in that Act, with respect to the duration and other incidents of titles granted under it. And, that being so, it is not disputed that the second section of the Act purpose of a charitable trust failed, the property would not revert to the heir of the donor, but would be settled by the Court on a cy-près scheme.[1] (3) Even on the assumption that the irritancy contained in the School Sites Act applied, it had not been incurred. It could only be incurred if the trustees could not carry on the school; not if they closed it in violation of their duty. In the present case the trustees could carry on the purposes of the trust by conveying the school to the School Board. They were entitled to do this, because the school was a subscription, and not an endowed, school.[2]

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The School Board had no title to defend the action. It was a body established by statute, and its rights and duties depended on statute, which did not confer any right or duty to intervene in an action like the present. Without challenging the title of the individual defenders, they had no interest to oppose makes the following provision, 'Provided that upon the said land so granted as aforesaid, or any part thereof, ceasing to be used for the purposes in this Act mentioned, the same shall thereupon immediately revert to and become a portion of the said estate held in fee-simple or otherwise, as fully to all intents and purposes as if this Act had not been passed, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.'

"Now, what is the supposed objection to the application in the present case of this statutory irritancy? It seemed to be something of this sort: (1) It was said that the site here extended to four acres, while the statute (which, inter alia, it has to be noted, empowers heirs of entail, and other disabled persons, to make conveyances for the purposes of this Act), confines the powers which it confers to sites not exceeding one acre. I fail, however, to see how the trustees, who accepted without objection the larger area, could be heard now to complain of the excess, or to claim that because the donor, being an owner in fee-simple, chose to exceed the limit expressed (plainly, I think, only for disabled persons), the title must therefore be read not as an invalid title, but (contrary to what it bears) as being a common law title, having no incidents beyond what the common law would imply. It appears to me that for the trustees this argument—supposing it sound—would be wholly jus tertii. It is in any case not an argument which, in my opinion, any Court would hold a body of trustees bound to take up and urge at the bidding of anybody.

"The next point was that the 14th section of the Act of 1841 provided (subject to certain safeguards), for excambions and sales of sites by the trustees or managers. But, of course, this power only applied while no irritancy had been incurred; and although no doubt its existence made, in possible circumstances, the donor's remedies somewhat imperfect, that imperfection could not, in my opinion, at all derogate from the effectiveness of the irritancy, while the power remained unexercised.

"The third point was, I think, even more extreme. It was rested on a somewhat loose expression at the close of the clause to the effect that the site should revert to the estate from which it had been given off. The suggestion was that Mr Hunter, whose position I have explained, had himself no estate adjacent to the site in question, and that the ground, although truly given off from the estate of Coltness, could not revert to any estate the decree. Their only legitimate interest in the matter was to secure free education for their children, and that was provided by the State. (2) The provisions of the School Sites Act, 1841, were incorporated in the trust. The two dispositions, by Mr Houldsworth and Mr Hunter, were practically one deed, and expressly bore to be granted under the authority of the Act. The limitation to one acre applied only to entailed lands. The disposition, though not exactly in the statutory form, was an adaptation of that form to Scottish conveyancing. Apart from the Act, the trustees had no title to the land, because the disposition contained no precept of sasine or warrant for registration, and was recorded before the Titles to Land (Scotland) Act, 1858, came into operation. Prior to that Act, apart from the School Sites Act, 1841, there was no authority for making up a title without expeding and recording an instrument of sasine. (3) The except to some estate held by Mr Hunter. I confess it seems to me that the meaning of the clause simply is, that the ground shall revert to the donor. But supposing it necessary that the donor should still possess the adjacent ground, the true donor in this case was, quite obviously, not Mr Hunter, but Mr Henry Houldsworth, whose grandson is now, as I have said, the proprietor of Coltness estate, and the leading pursuer.

"It remains, however, to consider whether the school has been in terms of the title discontinued. And here there is no doubt of one thing, that it has been discontinued in point of fact. It has been closed for at least a year, and (so far as the circumstance is of importance) after eighteen months' notice of the intention to close it. What is suggested, however, is that in closing the school, the trustees acted unlawfully and in breach of their trust—unlawfully, because they had, it is said, the power to secure the continuance of the school, by handing it over to the School Board, who were willing to take it over.

"Now, although I had an ingenious argument upon this, as upon the other points in the case, I am in the first place unable to understand what the pursuers have to do with the trustees' rights and duties in a question with third parties; or how the school having been, in fact, closed for a year, they (the pursuers) have any concern as to whether the trustees in so closing it acted rightly or wrongly. The pursuers may, I think, well ask why if the School Board desired to enforce against the trustees their alleged duty either to continue the school, or to hand it over to them (the School Board), they did not bring an action to try that question during the eighteen months before the school was in fact closed.

"But, in the next place, if I am to deal with the matter on its merits, I must state it as my opinion (1) that it is not at all clear that this was a school erected or maintained by contributions or donations in the sense of the 38th section of the Act of 1872, and therefore a school which the trustees could, even if they desired to do so, hand over to the School Board; (2) that it is, on the other hand, quite clear that the trustees are at least under no duty to do so, either under their trust-deed, or on any general doctrine of trust law. I rather think that, although the School Board make some general averments the other way, this was really a school founded by the Coltness Company, or its partners, under trusts which were to some extent of a special character. But even if that were otherwise, the 38th section of the Act is at best only permissive, and applies only where the managers or trustees of the school are of opinion, and resolve, that it is proper to hand it over to the management of the School Board.

"The result, on the whole, is that the defences lodged by the compearing defenders fall to be repelled, and the pursuers fall to have decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons—with expenses against the compearing defenders."

irritancy provided by the School Sites Act had been incurred. The school was in fact no longer carried on, and the site therefore reverted to the heir of the donor. The doctrine of cy-près had no application to the case of a statutory irritancy. Even assuming that it had, no cy-près scheme was suggested, except to hand the school over to the School Board. That the trustees had no power to do. It was an endowed school, and therefore could not be gratuitously transferred to the School Board.[1] Nor had trustees any right to delegate their duties to a public body.[2] Again, the proposal to transfer the school to the School Board was in effect a scheme to divert an educational endowment to the relief of the rates, which the Court would never sanction.[3] Therefore, as the trustees had no funds to carry on the school, and no power to adopt the only cy-près scheme suggested, the irritancy provided by the statute had necessarily been incurred. (4) Apart from the School Sites Act the pursuers were entitled to decree at common law. The trust purposes, as above explained, could not be carried out, and no cy-près scheme was possible. In such cases, where the trust was for one specific purpose which cannot be effected, the trust property reverted to the donor.[4] Moreover, the maintenance of a school of the class contemplated by the donor was a real condition of the title given. If the condition was not fulfilled the donor or his heir was entitled to recover the land given by an action of declarator and adjudication, even if there were no express irritancy.

LORD YOUNG.—The terms of the trust here are clear enough, the purposes of the trust being to erect a school and to conduct the school, the conduct of the school being under the control and management of the trustees who are to appoint a teacher who is always to be subject to dismissal by them, and to make any rules they think proper for the admission of scholars. These are the purposes of the trust. The school was erected and it was carried on on behalf of the trustees for a number of years by teachers appointed by them, all management of the school being in their hands. In short, the trustees were the governing body. Two or three years ago, circumstances having changed very much owing to the success of the School Board system providing satisfactory and gratuitous education to all those requiring it within the district of each School Board—the circumstances so changed that the attendance at the school was not sufficient to satisfy the trustees that it could be carried on with any advantage to the public, or that they had the means of carrying it on. Previous to the stoppage, the means were supplied gratuitously and charitably by the truster and the Coltness Iron Company, who had between them provided the land and everything that was necessary for carrying out the trust. They ceased to make these contributions, and the donation of £842, or any donation at all by the Government out of parliamentary funds, was not repeated. The Coltness Iron Company having intimated to the trustees that they did not intend to continue to support the school, in view of the requirements recently made by the Education Board, the trustees, having no funds to carry on the school, intimated to the School Board that after eighteen months the school would be closed. In these circumstances, the trustees had to consider, as all trustees for educational or charitable purposes have to do, whether if that could not be done they could suggest any scheme whereby something similar to carrying on that school could be suggested; and they came to the conclusion that they could suggest nothing that was cy-près to the intentions of the truster, and accordingly that the trust could not be carried on. Now, I suppose they were advised that the law in these circumstances was that the trust-estate must return to the donor, and I am of opinion that if they were so advised, they were well advised, for when a trust such as this cannot be continued and no other scheme can be suggested by the trustees, or ought to be suggested by the trustees, I am of opinion that the law is that the property must return to the truster, the owner, who gave it, who instituted the trust, that it requires no ultimate destination to the heirs to attain that result, but that the result follows on the impossibility of carrying on a trust in the way specified in the trust-deed, or by any substitute which could be suggested for that.

The trustees have not entered appearance at all, being of the opinion that they could not resist an action at the instance of the truster or those representing him, the donor of the trust-estate. Certain other parties have, however, appeared, among them the School Board, and also the parents of some children who are in the position of school children such as would have attended that school if it had been carried on under the trust. These parents have the same agent and counsel as the School Board, and we have to consider, or it is at least legitimate to consider, the cy-près scheme which they suggest, though I am of opinion, for the reason which I shall state immediately, that neither of them is a party or are parties who can legitimately appear as parties in this action. The cy-près scheme suggested by the School Board is that the land should be handed over to them that they may erect a school upon it. That is their cy-près, and the only cy-près which they suggest, but counsel suggested, as representing the parents of some of the school children, that the school should be carried on and supported by the trustees for them (with what money they do not say), or should be handed over to the School Board in order that they should erect a school there more economically for the ratepayers. These are the cy-près. Well, I think the suggestion confirms the opinion which one would form to begin with, that the trustees having considered the matter arrived at a right conclusion,—that there was no reasonable scheme to which they could append their names and suggest to the Court. I therefore come to the conclusion that neither can the trust be carried on as it was constituted, nor is there any suggestion of a cy-près scheme to come in place of it. The testamentary trustees would have violated their trust, I think, obviously and manifestly, and could have been restrained by the trusters from so acting had they proposed to convey the land or any part of it to the School Board, or to sell the lands and contribute the price to the School Board, that they might have more money than they receive by rates or from contributions from the money voted by Parliament.

Now, I do not think it is necessary to go further than that. The trust cannot be carried on as constituted, no reasonable suggestion of any scheme within the scope and meaning, but different in its particulars, has been suggested by the proper parties to suggest it, or has been suggested by either the School Board or these parents. I am of opinion, however, that neither the School Board nor these parents are proper parties here. School Boards are statutory bodies, having statutory, and only statutory, duties to perform, and having statutory, and only statutory, funds in order to carry them on, these consisting of the rates and of contributions made by Parliament, assigned from time to time and provided by Parliament—by the proper authority in London, the Education Department. These are the funds that they have assigned to them for the purpose, as a statutory body, of discharging their statutory duties, and it was no statutory duty of theirs as a governing body—the governing body of the Board schools, and the governing body of no other school—it was no part of their duty or within their competence to appear in this Court to suggest to the Court a cy-près scheme, or to maintain that the trustees of a particular trust should have suggested a cy-près scheme. I think that is manifestly outside their duty. It is not their duty as a statutory body, and the suggestion that they are the beneficiaries under this trust is to my mind altogether extravagant.

Then, as to the parents of these children. Had they the power they might no doubt come forward and say,—"The trustees were appointed to carry on the trust, and keep this school in order that our children might attend it." But my opinion began with the view which I have stated distinctly, that the trustees cannot carry on the trust. Then what is their interest? Their interest is to get free education, and the free education which they suggest is education in schools under the control and management of the School Board. Well, they have that at present. It would be more convenient to have a school at this place. Well, that again can be acquired by the Local Board if it is necessary, and reasonably within the scope of their duty to acquire it under their statutory powers. They can acquire any land which they properly deem to be necessary which is approved of for the erection of a board school at a convenient place, and they can acquire that, if it is reasonably necessary, under their statutory powers.

I am therefore of opinion that the parents of school children having manifestly on their own statement no interest in the matter at all should not have been allowed to appear here, and therefore however desirable it might be that the conclusions of this action should be declared by the Court—that is to say, that the pursuers should be successful—not in an undefended case, but as in a case with proper defenders entitled to appear as defenders, and be received by the Court as defenders, that view cannot be taken. I think we have no defenders here account of whom we can judicially take. I think the pursuers acted very properly by calling neither of them as defenders, and that there is no objection to their action because competent and proper defenders have not been called. I reject the view, so far as my opinion goes, that we have any conceivable defender here at all, and I give an expression of my opinion that the Lord Ordinary's view is right; that the pursuers are entitled to declarator on that ground, as there is no defence.

LORD TRAYNER.—This is an action of declarator and adjudication brought at the instance of Mr Houldsworth to have it declared that certain subjects described in the conclusions of the summons belong to him, and should be adjudged to him. In this action he very properly called as defenders the persons in whom the subjects were vested feudally, there being at the time the action was raised no other defender whom he could call. Since then the School Board, and certain persons claiming to be beneficiaries under the trust, to be afterwards referred to, have compeared and been sisted as defenders. I dissent from the view, first, that the compearers are not entitled to be heard, and, secondly, that it was irregular to proceed with the case with them as defenders.

I do not doubt that any beneficiary under a trust is entitled to interfere and call the trustees to account for their administration of the trust. If the trustees propose to do something contrary to the trust a beneficiary is entitled to come forward in the action in which they seek to do it and oppose the proceedings. If the trustees neglect to do something which is incumbent on them under the trust, the beneficiaries under the trust have an undoubted title to come forward and insist that they shall do what the truster directed. I think there is no question that the persons represented here as beneficiaries are beneficiaries under this trust, and that it was not only their right to come forward and state their objections to the pursuer's action, but that the Lord Ordinary would have been distinctly wrong if he had refused to hear them.

But having got defenders who are competent and proper contradictors to the pursuer's claim, the question is whether the pursuer is to get decree. Now, the pursuer's action is based chiefly on the terms of the section quoted in condescendence 8 from the School Sites Act of 1841. The defenders have maintained that that clause cannot be imported into the trust nor pleaded upon by the pursuer. On that matter I think the defenders are quite wrong. I think the Lord Ordinary was right in giving effect to that section of the School Sites Act of 1841, and I shall state in a word or two the grounds on which I think so.

Mr Houldsworth on 11th September 1858, being the heritable proprietor of the land in question conveyed it to Mr Hunter, and conveyed it to him as expressed in his conveyance, "to be possessed and applied" as a site for a school and schoolmaster's house. Why Mr Houldsworth conveyed to Mr Hunter under this restricted and limited condition for this restricted and limited purpose I do not know. He might have proceeded at once to convey it to trustees. However, there was some reason, I assume, for what he did; but the result is exactly the same as if he had done so, because when Mr Hunter was feudally vested in the subjects he conveyed them by disposition in favour of certain trustees in December 1858. That disposition sets out with the narrative that he freely, voluntarily, and under authority of this Act (the School Sites Act), and for the purpose which it describes, conveys the lands to be applied as a site for a school for the district of Newmains for children of the labouring, manufacturing, and other poorer classes in the parish or vicinity thereof, and for a residence for the teacher of the school. I put it thus generally, because it is not necessary to quote the exact words of the trust-conveyance. It is said for the defenders that this was not a trust constituted under the Act of 1841. I think that is a mistake. It is said in the first place that the trust-deed is not in the terms of the form given by the statute. Well, I have compared it with the terms of the statute, and I find in its dispositive clause that it is practically the same if you take into account that this is a Scottish conveyance of Scottish heritage, and that the statute of 1841 is in its language more applicable to the constitution of a heritable right in England than in Scotland. But there is practically no difference between the disposition granted by Mr Hunter in trust and the disposition which, according to the statute of 1841, was to be granted under the authority of that statute. But Mr Hunter connects himself and his trust-deed absolutely with the statute of 1841 by the introductory words of his conveyance. He says that he does it under authority of the Act, and these are the words so far of the statutory conveyance. That he needed no authority to execute the trust-deed is certain, because he was fee-simple proprietor and could do what he liked with his own. But the words "under authority of these Acts" must be read as equivalent to "in pursuance of the Act of 1841." Now, the Act of 1841 as incorporated into the constitution of this trust provides at once an answer to the defenders' objection, because it provides in section 2 that where a trust has been constituted of this character, upon the lands so granted, or any part thereof, ceasing to be used for the purposes of the Act, the same shall thereupon immediately revert to and become a portion of the estate of which they had formed part as fully to all intents and purposes as if this Act had not been passed.

Now, it is matter of fact here that the purpose for which this deed was granted has come to an end. It is the fact that for eighteen months this school has been closed, and has been closed by the trustees for the very satisfactory reason that they had no means whatever for carrying it on. It was not a capricious act on their part; the necessity of the circumstances in which they were placed compelled them, and accordingly we are now within the very words of this statute, that the land granted has ceased to be used for the purpose for which it was conveyed to the trustees. In these circumstances the statute distinctly provides that the lands so granted shall revert to the estate from which they were taken. Now, the estate from which they were taken was the estate of Mr Houldsworth of Coltness. The pursuer, as representative and heir of Mr Houldsworth of Coltness (out of which this trust property came), is now therefore the person to whom it reverts, as it is no longer used for the purposes mentioned in the trust.

I would add another word, and it is this, I think it is an advantage to the pursuer in this case that the Lord Ordinary allowed the defenders to appear and state their objections, because in my opinion they were proper contradictors, and in that event Mr Houldsworth is now getting a decree of declarator in foro, instead of a decree in absence, against the trustees whom he called originally. No. 54.

Dec. 16, 1904. Houldsworth v. School Board of Cambusnethan.

I hold with your Lordship that the School Board has no title or interest to appear here, but with regard to the beneficiaries, while I admit their title to appear and be heard, I think their defences or objections must be repelled, because they have failed to shew any interest to maintain them. The only interest they have is to obtain free education for their children, and that the Government now supplies, and accordingly, they have no interest to maintain the trust.

On these grounds I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be affirmed.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I agree. In regard to the first compearers I think that the School Board has no title to oppose the conclusion of this summons. I am inclined to think that the other compearers, the parents of children living in the neighbourhood and parish, have a title to appear, but I think they have failed to state any tangible interest to oppose the conclusions of the summons.

The feu-charter granted by Mr Houldsworth in favour of Mr James Hunter, proceeds on the narrative that he has been requested by the Coltness Iron Company, which was in course of erecting a school for the district of Newmains, in the parish of Cambusnethan, for children of the labouring, manufacturing, and other poorer classes therein, to grant them a piece of ground upon which to build a school and a residence for the teacher. That is the purpose for which the ground was required, and Mr Houldsworth accordingly did grant them by charter a site of four acres for that purpose. I think it is clear that Mr James Hunter, in whose favour that feu-charter was granted, was really the hand of Mr Houldsworth, and the question is practically the same as if Mr Houldsworth was the person who executed the trust-deed in favour of the defenders who were called as trustees for the school of Newmains. Now, that trust-deed by Mr Houldsworth professes to proceed upon the authority of the Act of 1841. The Act of 1841 applies in terms to such bequests, because it applies not only to entailed properties, but to properties held in fee-simple. But I do not think it matters in the least whether strictly speaking it applies to land held in fee-simple in Scotland where the proprietor can do as he likes with his ground, and attach such conditions as he chooses to a conveyance of it, because, under this disposition it is plain that the granter adopted the terms of the Act of 1841 as the basis of his grant. Now, the second section of the School Sites Act, 1841, empowers a proprietor holding land either in fee-simple or entail to grant by way of gift one acre of his land as a site for a school for the education of poor persons, or for the residence of the schoolmaster or schoolmistress, or otherwise for the purpose of the education of such poorer persons in religious and useful knowledge.

I pass by the question about the one acre limit, because I think it is immaterial to the question we have to decide. But then there is a provision that "upon the said lands so granted as aforesaid, or any part thereof, ceasing to be used for the purposes in this Act mentioned, the same shall thereupon immediately revert to and become a portion of the said estate held in fee-simple or otherwise." That is the estate of the person, the proprietor who has made the grant for the erection of a school, or of a schoolmaster's house. That is the condition of the grant. Now, what happened in this case was simply this: Many years ago the Coltness Company under this deed, which is dated in 1858, erected a school at considerable expense, the greater part of which was defrayed partly by the Coltness Iron Company and partly by grant from Government which is not now redemanded; and they carried on or tried to carry on this school until about two years ago. At that point the Coltness Iron Company, who were the principal subscribers to the school, and practically at whose expense the school was being carried on, intimated that they could no longer continue their subscription. The school was not serving the purpose for which the disposition was made, and they intimated that they would no longer subscribe. Thereupon, the trustees intimated to the School Board their intention to close the school in eighteen months, and they did close the school. They found they could not fulfil the purpose of the trust by carrying it on.

No. 54.

Dec. 16, 1904. Houldsworth v. School Board of Cambusnethan.

Now, the question is whether there is anything to prevent the ground being claimed by the proprietor who made the original grant. The persons who were originally called as the defenders in this action were simply the trustees under this trust. They entered no appearance, and I am not surprised at it, because they must have felt that they had no defence to the action. But appearance has been made for other parties to whom reference has already been made; and the question is whether either of them, either the School Board or the parents of children in the parish, had any title or interest to do what the trustees felt they could not do—oppose the demands of Mr Houldsworth. Now, as I have already said, I think the School Board has no title to appear here. As to the others I assume they have a title to appear, but they have failed to shew that the trustees have committed any breach of trust, or that they themselves have any interest to insist either on the trustees carrying on the school themselves—which is impossible in the present state of matters—or presenting a petition on the footing of cy-près for authority for the School Board to carry on the school for purposes other than those mentioned in this trust-deed.

On the whole matter I agree with both your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships.

THE COURT adhered.

In a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, against his employer, held (diss. Lord Young), that in estimating his average weekly earnings, his earnings under the contractor could not be taken into account.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,* between William Hunter, miner, Kilsyth, and William Baird & Company, Limited, coalmasters, Glasgow, in which Hunter claimed compensation at the rate of 16s. 3d. per week for injuries sustained in the course of his employment, the Sheriff-substitute (Mark Davidson) awarded compensation at the rate of 2s. 10½d. per week, and, at the instance of Hunter, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth the following facts as admitted or proved:—"1. That the appellant was employed as a miner in respondents' Dumbreck Pit, Kilsyth, under four different contractors, between 12th October 1902 and 7th October 1903. 2. That the said contractors were employed by the respondents at a contract price per ton for the amount of coal brought by them to the pit-head. 2. The said contractors employed workmen to assist them at a daily wage. 4. A fixed weekly sum was deducted from their wages for the general medical fund at the pit. 5. That on the last-mentioned date the appellant was discharged by Reid, one of said contractors, in whose immediate employment he then was. 6. That he was out of employment on 8th October 1903. 7. That on 9th October 1903 he entered respondents' employment as a miner, his earnings being dependent upon his output of coal. 8. That 10th October 1903 was a Saturday, being the conclusion of the trade week in the works of the respondents; that the appellant worked again on 12th October; that on that date, while in the course of his employment, a stone fell upon his right leg, whereby he was injured; and that in consequence of said accident he has been unable to earn wages since. 9. That his total earnings during the period from 9th to 12th October 1903 were 11s. 6d., and that respondents offered appellant compensation at the rate of 2s. 10½d. per week."

On these facts the Sheriff-substitute held—"1. That the appellant received injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment in a mine of which the respondents were undertakers within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. 2. That the average weekly earnings of the appellant while in the employment of the respondents were 5s. 9d."

He accordingly found the appellant entitled to compensation at the rate of 2s. 10½d. per week.

The following questions of law were stated:—"(1) Whether the appellant was in the employment of the respondents prior to 7th October 1903? (2) Whether, in assessing the compensation to which the appellant is entitled, any portion of his earnings prior to 7th October 1903 fall to be considered?"

Argued for the appellant;—There was here a case of continuous employment under the same employer within the meaning of section 1, subsection 3, of the Act. The word "employer" must not be construed too strictly; it would be absurd to hold that whenever any change took place in a firm of mine owners all their workmen entered into a new course of employment for the purposes of the Act. Here it was not really necessary to give a wide meaning to the word "employer"; employment in a mine by contractors was employment by the mine owners.[1]

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the statement of facts is to this effect, that this man was employed, for a certain period named in the case, by a series of contractors. Then the statement proceeds to say that he came to be out of employment on 8th October 1903, and that on 9th October of that year he entered the respondents' employment as a miner, his wages being dependent upon his output of coal. Now, the respondents' contention is that the period of employment by them was that beginning on 9th October, and that therefore the Court ought to find that he is only entitled to compensation on his earnings subsequent to that date. In my opinion that contention is sound, and the decision of the Sheriff to that effect is right.

LORD YOUNG.—The statement of facts is a peculiar one certainly—that the appellant was employed as a miner in the respondents' pit under four different contractors between 12th October 1902 and 7th October 1903; that these contractors were employed by the respondents at a contract price per ton for the amount of coal brought by them to the pit-head; that on the 7th October the appellant was discharged by one of the contractors in whose immediate employment he then was; and then that he was out of employment on 8th October, and on 9th October 1903 entered the respondents' employment as a miner to do their work in their pit, his earnings being dependent upon his output of coal.

The question is whether that was or was not continuous employment under the same employer. I should have thought that it was, and that if the man had been in the employment, say, of a father who died in the course of his employment, and the business was taken up by his son, and he kept on the father's workmen, and the miner went on working at the same wages under the son as he had had under the father—I should have regarded that as the same employer. That is the only good sense of the thing, and therefore the meaning of the statute; and when a mine owner has the work done for him by contractors who employ workmen, I should have thought that the employment of anybody by these contractors, to do the work in the mine owner's pit, was employment under the same employer, and that the real injury which the man suffered was deprivation of the work which he had continuously been employed to do for a whole year or approaching a whole year. To arrive at the other conclusion may be conforming to the literal interpretation of the statute, but is against the obvious meaning of the Act, and the obvious justice of the thing to the sufferer in the very matter which the Act contemplates and provides that he shall have recompense for.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the Sheriff is right, and I cannot see how, on a sound construction of the statute (taking the Sheriff's statements of the facts), he could arrive at any other conclusion. The facts are that this man was employed not by the respondents, but by an independent contractor or four independent contractors in the same pit for a period of about twelve months. But the Sheriff's statement excludes the idea that the twelve months could be employment in the service of the respondents. He says that this appellant was out of employment on the 8th of October, and that he "entered" the respondents' employment—that is, he commenced to be the respondents' servant—on 9th October. If he had entered the service of the respondents on the 9th October, it is quite obvious that he was not continuously in their employment prior to that date. The one statement excludes the other. But I think it is worth noticing that the terms of the employment under the contractors and the terms of the employment under the respondents were different in material respects, because the work done by the appellant under a contractor was remunerated by payment of a daily wage, whereas under his employment with the respondents his earnings depended upon his output of coal. So that the two contracts—namely, the contract of service with the contractor and that with the respondents—were not only between different parties, but were also different in their conditions. I do not think there is much difficulty about the construction of the statute. Schedule I., section 1, subsection (b), provides that when total or partial incapacity arises from an accident such as we have here described, the workman shall be entitled to compensation not exceeding 50 per cent of his average weekly earnings during the period of twelve months if he has been so long employed, but, if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer. You cannot take into account employment for twelve months anterior to the accident, or for any period whatever, unless it has been employment under the same employer, and, in my opinion, that means the employer in whose employment the injury has been received for which compensation is claimed. Now, in this case the Sheriff has negatived the suggestion that the employment of the appellant was under the respondents for more than the two or three days he has enumerated. I think this a very hard case for the appellant, but, though hard, I think the necessary outcome is that the Sheriff had no alternative but to reach the conclusion to which he gave effect.

LORD MONCREIFF.—On the questions put to us by the Sheriff, and on the facts found by him, I agree with the majority of your Lordships. The appellant's claim is not made against the respondents as undertakers under the statute. The one question is whether the appellant was throughout in the employment of the respondents prior to 7th October 1903. Now, the Sheriff states as a matter of fact that he was not—that prior to 7th October 1903 he was in the service of various contractors, no doubt in the defenders' pit, but in the service of the contractors, and that then a change of employment took place, and that he entered the employment of the defenders for the first time on 9th October 1903. On these facts I think we can only look at the period subsequent to 9th October 1903. Unfortunately this accident occurred on 12th October, after he had only worked two days—but two days in different weeks; and on these facts, and on these questions of law, I do not think we have any alternative but to find that the Sheriff has decided the case rightly.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Answer the second question in the case in the negative: Therefore affirm the award of the arbitrator, and decern."

The lands or commonty of the burgh of Musselburgh, which was a burgh of barony and regality, were held under a charter of novodamus, dated 25th August 1670, granted by John, Earl of Lauderdale, Lord of the Lordship and Regality of Musselburgh, and Lord Superior of the burgh, and holding the same as vassal under the Crown, in favour of the bailies, councillors, and community of Musselburgh, by which charter there was, inter alia, given, granted, and confirmed to the aforesaid bailies, councillors, and community of the said burgh, and to their successors, "communiam dicti burgi infra limites et bondas subtasmentionatas viz. 'lie ebbing and flowing of the sea' ex boreali partibus secundum eorum priorem possessionem et prout dicta communia per incolas dicti burgi possessa fuit." The charter contained a grant of various port and harbour rights in favour of the burgh.

In November 1902 the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of Musselburgh raised an action against the Musselburgh Real Estate Company, Limited, and John Downie, contractor, Musselburgh, concluding for declarator "that the pursuers have the sole and exclusive right, title to, and property in (a) the foreshore ex adverso of that piece of waste ground or sea-green shewn, . . . lying to the north or seawards of the piece of enclosed ground belonging to the defenders, the Musselburgh Real Estate Company, known as Mackinlay's Park, lying within the burgh of Musselburgh." The summons also contained a similar conclusion with reference to an adjacent property also belonging to the defenders called Rosehall, but the questions raised in regard to that property are outside the scope of the present report. There were further conclusions as to the digging and taking away of sand, &c., from the foreshore, which it is unnecessary here to set forth.

The ground known as Mackinlay's Park was situated at the corner of Fisherrow Links formed by the river Esk on the east and the sea on the north, and was held by the defenders, the Musselburgh Real Estate Company, Limited, hereinafter called "the defenders" as vassals of the burgh, being part of the commonty of the burgh under the above-mentioned charter from the Earl of Lauderdale. The foreshore on the north of Mackinlay's Park extended to about 70 acres, and contained valuable deposits of sand and gravel.

The main question raised in the present action, in so far as now reported, was as to whether the description "bounded on the north by the sea-beach" in the defenders' title included this foreshore.

The defenders' title was based on a feu-contract, dated 18th and 19th April 1826, by which the burgh disponed to William and James Aitchison (of whom the defenders were the singular successors) the piece of ground afterwards known as Mackinlay's Park. By this feu-contract "the said Magistrates, Treasurer, and Council having by Act of Council, dated the 7th day of April in the year 1825, granted to the said Messieurs William and James Aitchison, a feu of that piece of ground lying at the east end and situated to the north of the park called Chalmers' Park, and forming part of the Links of Fisherrow, proceeding upon an application from the said William and James Aitchison, the said Magistrates and Council, by said Act of Council, feued to them a part and portion of said ground, to be then afterwards staked off, at the sum of £6 sterling per acre of yearly feu-duty . . . therefore the said Magistrates . . . dispone to and in favour of the said William Aitchison junior, and James Aitchison, and their heirs and disponees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the said piece of ground lying at the east end of the Links of Fisherrow, situated to the north of the park called Chalmers' Park, measuring seven acres four falls and three-fourths of a fall x x x* of ground or thereby, and bounded as follows, viz.: —on the east by the [Blank in Charter] River Esk, separating the ground hereby disponed from the said river, which bank shall remain open and unfeued not only along the river, but also along by the sea, jurisdiction of the town of Musselburgh . . . to be holden of the said Magistrates, Treasurer, and Council, as representing the community of the said burgh, and their successors in office, in feu-farm, fee, and heritage for ever, for the yearly payment of the sum of forty-two pounds three shillings and sixpence three farthings sterling, in name of feu-duty. . . ."

The pursuers averred that they had from time immemorial, and since the date of the defenders' title, continuously and uninterruptedly possessed and administered the foreshore (in various ways which they specified), as part of the burgh property, and had all along been recognised as proprietors thereof. They further averred that the defenders and their predecessors in title had never possessed the foreshore in any manner of way.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) In virtue of the pursuers' title, and the possession had by them under their infeftments, the pursuers had the sole and exclusive right and title to the foreshore mentioned in the summons, and are entitled to declarator to that effect as concluded for.

The defenders denied the pursuers' averments as to possession, and averred acts of proprietorship on their own part over the foreshore.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant. (3) The pursuers' statements so far as material, and in particular their averment regarding possession, being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied. (4) The defenders, the Musselburgh Estate Company, being proprietors of the foreshore mentioned in the summons, they are entitled to absolvitor.

On 24th November 1903 the Lord Ordinary (Low) after a discussion in the Procedure-roll, allowed a proof before answer, and on 18th May 1904 proof was led.

The result of the evidence as to the possession of the foreshore is sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

A question was also raised as to the words to be read into the blank in the description of the eastern boundary in the feu-contract, the facts regarding which are fully stated by the Lord Ordinary.

On 2d August 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons, in so far as regarded the foreshore ex adverso of Mackinlay's Park.*

* "OPINION.—The burgh lands of Musselburgh extend along the seashore for a long distance, and include the foreshore. The original charter conveying the lands to the burgh appears to have been granted by the Earl of Lauderdale in 1670, and what is disponed as the common of the burgh is described as bounded on the north 'by the ebbing and flowing of the sea.' I understand that that grant was subsequently confirmed by royal charter.

"The defenders are proprietors of two properties held in feu from the Magistrates, and adjacent to the seashore, and the question raised in this case is whether the foreshore ex adverso of these properties belongs to the pursuers or the defenders? The properties are named respectively Mackinlay Park and Rosehall, and I shall deal with them in that order.

"The original title to Mackinlay Park was a feu-contract, granted by the Magistrates in 1826 to William and James Aitchison. The boundary on the north is described in the feu-contract as being 'the sea-beach,' and when the case was first heard in the Procedure-roll the defenders argued that it was settled that a boundary by the 'sea-beach' was equivalent to a boundary by the 'sea,' and that therefore the foreshore belonged to them.

No. 56.

Dec. 21, 1904. Magistrates of Musselburgh v. Musselburgh Real Estate Co., Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The foreshore belonged to the defenders, having been conveyed to them in 1826, and never having been re-acquired by the pursuers. A boundary by the "sea-beach" was equivalent to a boundary by the "sea," and in every case included a grant of the foreshore.[1] The northern boundary was distinctly stated in the deed to be the sea-beach, and it was not competent to explain or modify it by reference either to other boundaries, or to measurements, or to possession. In any event, the eastern boundary was the River Esk, and not its bank, it being wholly incompetent to read into the deed deleted words from a draft.[2] In any case, a "bank" only meant the line separating land and water, and a boundary by the bank of a river was the same as a boundary by the river itself.[3] In a question between subject proprietors the presumption was that the property in the foreshore—like the property in the banks of a river[4]—belonged to the owners of the conterminous

---

I was by no means satisfied, in view of the terms of the feu-contract, that in this case a boundary by the 'sea-beach' was the same thing as a boundary by the sea, and further, there were averments of exclusive possession of the foreshore by the pursuers which seemed to me to necessitate inquiry. I accordingly allowed a proof, and I have now to determine the question at issue upon the large body of evidence which has been adduced.

"I shall in the first place again examine the terms of the feu-contract of 1826, which I think I am in a better position to construe now than I was formerly, because I now know the precise situation of the feu and the local conditions.

"The feu is situated at the corner of the Fisherrow Links, which is formed by the River Esk and the seashore,—a fact which, as I shall afterwards shew, appears to me to be of some importance.

"The feu-contract commences by narrating that the Magistrates had, by an act of Council, granted a feu to the Messrs Aitchison, at the rate of £6 per acre of feu-duty, of a portion of the Links of Fisherrow to be 'afterwards staked off.' Then, in implement of the act of Council, the Magistrates disponed to the Aitchisons 'All and Whole the said piece of ground lying at the east end of the Links of Fisherrow, situated to the north of the park called Chalmers' Park, measuring 7 acres 4 falls and ¾ of a fall of ground or thereby, and bounded as follows, viz.:—On the east by the River Esk, separating the ground hereby disponed from the said river, which bank shall remain open and unfeued not only along the river but also along by the sea, excepting to William and James Aitchison or their foresaids; on the west by the town of Musselburgh's common ground still unfeued; on the south by a stone dyke enclosing the ground called Chalmers' Park, and partly by the town's common ground; and on lands as an accessory.[1] The reference in the feu-contract to landing and exporting goods from the ground disponed supported the view that the grant extended to low-water mark. The acts of possession averred by the pursuers were not proved, or only took place by the consent of the defenders and under reservation of their rights.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The town of Musselburgh never parted with the property of the foreshore, or (2) if it had, it had re-acquired it by possession for the prescriptive period. (1) It was not included in the feu-contract. A boundary by the sea-beach was not the same as a boundary by the "sea," and did not convey the foreshore.[2] At least, there was no more than a presumption that the boundaries were equivalent, and in the present case this presumption was displaced by the other terms of the deed, which shewed that the foreshore was excluded from the grant. The measurements (which were taxative, and to which it was competent to refer, the boundaries being the north by the sea-beach; and it is hereby expressly agreed and stipulated that if at any time hereafter, either by the receding of the sea or river, or otherwise, the said William and James Aitchison shall take possession of the ground so left, then and in that case the said William and James Aitchison shall pay feu for the said increased quantity of ground at the rate of £6 sterling per acre, with free ish and entry thereto from the east and north.'

"Power is then given to the feuars to convey any quantity of water from the river 'by open cuts or otherwise . . . upon condition always of their conveying the surplus water again into the river within the boundaries of their own property and without stagnation, as the said piece of ground was measured by authority of the said Magistrates by James Hay, land-surveyor . . . with the teinds, both parsonage and vicarage, of the said piece of ground, and free ish and entry thereto by the bank of the River Esk on the east.'

"The measurement given in by Mr Hay has been recovered, and runs thus:—'Measurement of feu on Fisherrow Links from the Honourable the Magistrates of Musselburgh to William Aitchison, Esquire, Drumore, bounded on the south by Mr Thomson's park, on the west and north by a line made by a cut in the turf along the beach, and on the east by a straight line between the north-east angle of Mr Thomson's park to a stake driven in at the mouth of the River Esk.'

"Then the area is given as 7 acres 0 roods 4¾ falls Scotch, or 8 acres 3 roods 17¼ perches imperial, and upon the back there is a calculation of the feu-duty, which is brought out at £42, 3s. 6¾d., the amount which was inserted in the feu-contract.

"I think that the first question is, what was the boundary of the feu riverward, because that has an important bearing upon the boundary seaward. The Esk, I should explain, is at this point a tidal river. The defenders maintain that the property is bounded by the river on the east, just as it is bounded by the sea on the north. That a question in regard to the boundary on the east is possible arises from the fact that in the description of the boundaries there is a blank space left before the words 'River Esk,' and the question is whether any words, and if so, what, are to be read into that space?

"I do not think that anyone could read the context without coming to ambiguous)[1] were in favour of the pursuers' contention, the extent of the foreshore claimed being far greater than the acreage stated in the deed. There was no grant of parts and pertinents. The references to "free ish and entry from the north,"[2] to the bank "along by the sea," which was to remain unfeued, to the land "to be staked off," and to the increased feu-duty to be paid for land left by the receding of the sea, were all unintelligible if the defenders' view were accepted. The pursuers' argument was consistent with the evidence of their uninterrupted possession of the foreshore, and was strengthened by reference to the eastern boundary, which was "the bank of the River Esk" (the words "bank of the" requiring to be read into the blank in the charter in order to make it intelligible). If the feu did not extend down to the river on the east, there was a strong presumption that it did not extend down to the sea on the north. (2) Even if the foreshore had been conveyed by the feu-contract of 1826, it had been the conclusion that words 'bank of the' must be read into the blank space, because if these words are read in the important clause which immediately follows is quite intelligible, which is not the case if the blank is not so filled up.

"The draft of the feu-contract has been produced, and both parties referred to it. I confess that I have doubts as to the competency of referring to the draft at all, but, however that may be, it does not seem to me to throw much light on the matter. The draft as originally written ran 'on the east by the bank of the River Esk'; then there had been interlined the words 'a road along,' making the clause run 'on the east by a road along the bank of the River Esk.' Then someone had run a pen through both the original words 'the bank of,' and the interlined words, 'a road along.' Therefore, according to the draft (giving effect to the deletions) the boundary on the east was the River Esk, and the defenders very legitimately found upon that fact. But then the question arises, why was the blank space left in engrossing the deed? It is plain that whoever engrossed the deed did not understand that the river was the boundary. And that is not surprising seeing that the clause which follows is inconsistent with the river being the boundary. That clause is in these terms—'which bank shall remain open and unfeued not only along the river but also along by the sea, excepting to William and James Aitchison or their foresaids.' That is obviously an important clause, because if the boundary was not the river but the river bank, it secured to the Aitchisons what would have been one of the chief advantages of having a river boundary, namely, that no one else could be interjected between them and the river. On the other hand, if the river was intended to be the boundary, the clause was altogether unnecessary and inofficious; and further, it is unintelligible without reading in words which are not there, because there is no previous mention of any bank. Therefore a blank space having been left presumably for words which were intended but were omitted to be filled in, and the context clearly suggesting that the words which were intended to be written in were 'the bank of the,' because these words make the deed intelligible and consistent, I think that the rules of construction require that these words should be read in.

"The defenders pointed out that when the feu-contract was engrossed other blank spaces were left for the area of the feu, and for the feu-duty. These blanks could not be filled in until Mr Hay had made his measure-

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case there are two separate properties, the extent of which is in dispute, the question being whether the feuars under their titles have right to the shore ex adverso of their feus extending to low-water mark. The first subject to be dealt with is that called Mackinlay Park. In the title the north boundary, being the boundary towards the sea, is described as the "sea-beach." This the defenders maintain is equivalent to a boundary by the "sea," which would carry the right of the defenders over the shore to low-water mark. It is true that in some early ments, and as his report is dated the very day upon which the feu-contract was executed by the Magistrates, the blank spaces must also have been filled in on that day. The defenders argued that as these blank spaces were filled in, while the blank space before the words 'River Esk' was not filled in, the inference is that it was not intended to fill in that space at all.

"I think that there are two answers to that argument. The first is, that if the blank space was not to be filled in with words, it ought to have been obliterated by stars or a line drawn along it, and it is to be observed that in the very line above that in which the space in question occurs, the space left for the dimensions of the feu was larger than was required, and the space not required was filled in with stars. In the second place, as I have pointed out, if the blank space was not to be filled up, it would have been necessary, to render that part of the feu-contract consistent and intelligible, to delete or alter the immediately following clause.

"Therefore, although I cannot tell why the blank space in question was not filled in, I think that those words must be read in to which the context so clearly points, the words namely 'bank of the.'

"The defenders, however, say further that, as matter of fact, there was no bank of the river which could be the boundary, because Mr Hay's measurements and the boundary lines defined by him, when taken in connection with old plans, shew that in order to get the area specified it was necessary to go to the high-water mark of the river. I am inclined to accept that view, but it does not lead me to the conclusion desired by the defenders. I think that it is plain enough that the Magistrates did not intend to retain any actual land between the feu and the river, but I also think that the terms of the feu-contract shew that they did not intend that the feuars should have a river boundary with all the rights which would result from such a boundary. The construction therefore which I put upon the contract is, that the feu extended as far as high-water mark of the river and no farther; and that by the bank of the river was meant the space covered at high tide but left dry at low water. That space, it appears to me, might very intelligibly be described as the bank of the river, because it was truly the river bank at low tide, when there was no water but that of the river.

"I have dealt fully with the question of the eastern boundary, because both parties, I think rightly, regarded it as very important, seeing that if the defenders were able to shew that they had a river boundary on the east, it would go far towards establishing that they had a sea boundary on the north, and conversely, if the defenders were cut off from the river, it is more easy to reach the conclusion that they were also cut off from the sea.

"I now come directly to the main question in the case, namely, what in this feu-contract is the meaning and effect of the northern boundary of the feu being described as the 'sea-beach.'

"As I have already indicated, the defenders' contention is that it is cases there are dicta which may be read as tending in that direction, but it has never been authoritatively decided that the two expressions must be read as meaning the same thing; and giving the best consideration I can to the matter I am unable to come to the conclusion that there is any ground for holding that "sea" and "sea-beach," when used as descriptions of boundary, do mean the same thing. On the contrary, I think that they are essentially different. The word "sea-beach" seems to me to describe a boundary by which the subject given off is bounded to the exclusion of the thing described as the boundary. In other words, that when the subject is said to be bounded on the north by the sea-beach, the line of boundary is reached when the beach is reached, and that to pass on to the beach is to pass the boundary, just as in the case of a boundary described as a certain wall, or a certain building, or a certain strip of plantation, when the wall settled that a boundary by the 'sea-beach' is synonymous with a boundary by the sea.

"I do not think that it is necessary to refer in detail to the numerous cases upon this branch of the law. I shall content myself with saying that, while in my humble opinion the well-known exposition of the law given by Lord Kinloch in the case of Hunter v. Lord Advocate (7 Macph. 899), was somewhat more sweeping and absolute in its terms than the previous decisions altogether warranted, I accept the result of all the authorities as being, that where there is nothing more to indicate the limits of a sea-board property than a description of the boundary as being the 'seashore' or the 'sea-beach,' these terms are regarded as being equivalent to a boundary by the 'sea,' because it is not in the general case to be presumed that the disponer intended to make a reservation which is not expressed, nor, on the other hand, that it was contemplated that it should be possible to interject another proprietor between the disponee and the sea.

"The expressions, however, the 'sea' and the 'sea-beach' are not, according to their ordinary meaning, identical, but, as ordinarily used, they denote different things. If, therefore, it appears from the terms of the grant, or from the terms of the grant when read in the light of the circumstances in which it was made, that the parties in using the term 'sea-beach' did not mean the 'sea,' I do not think that there is any rule of law which prevents effect being given to their intention.

"Turning now from the general question to the precise circumstances of this case, I think that it is plain that the Magistrates had an interest not to part with the property of the foreshore. The foreshore of the burgh lands is of large extent both along the shore and to seaward. The extent to seaward is illustrated by the fact that the part of the foreshore ex adverso of the eight acres of Mackinlay Park amounts to from seventy to eighty acres, or about ten times the area specified in the feu-contract. Then the foreshore, especially near the part where Mackinlay Park is situated, has large deposits of valuable sand and gravel from which a considerable revenue is derived, and further, the Magistrates have certain rights of harbour and of levying shore dues and customs. Their interest, therefore, to maintain absolute control over the foreshore appears to me to be plain enough, and accordingly I do not think that there is the same presumption here as in the ordinary case, that in giving out sea-board feus with a boundary by the sea-beach they intended to give the feuar a right of property down to the sea at low water.

"The question, however, depends mainly upon the terms of the feu-contract, to which I now return. The first observation which I have to make upon it is that there is no clause of parts and pertinents. In the next place, it is provided that the ground feued is to be 'staked off.' That might peror building is reached the extreme limit of the feu is reached, or when the plantation is entered the person entering it is past the boundary. The case is not the same as where a river or a road is named as a boundary. The water of a river and the surface of a road are peculiar, inasmuch as there are rights of coterminous and higher and lower heritors over the whole water of the river, and the rights of coterminous proprietors on either side of the road are restricted by the existence of the highway set apart for public traffic. But the solum in such cases, unless there is anything to the contrary in the titles, belongs to the proprietors, each up to the medium filum subject to the flow of the river and the maintenance and use of the road respectively. But there is and could be no such presumption in the case of lands next the sea, and it appears to me that "sea-beach" as a boundary must be held to exclude the beach itself, for that which is bounded by another thing cannot include the whole of that thing itself.

haps be read as meaning that the boundaries were to be staked off on the landward sides only, and not towards the river or the sea, but the natural meaning of the expression is that the boundaries were to be staked off on every side. If so, the provision, although by no means conclusive, is important, as is shewn by the case of Smart v. Magistrates of Dundee (3 Pat. 606, 8 Brown, Ca. in Parl. 119), where considerable weight was given to the fact that the property was described as an 'enclosed yard.'

"The measurement made by Mr Hay I take to have been the staking off of the ground, and the terms of his report, which I have already quoted, seem to me to be important. The boundary on the north is here said to be 'a line cut in the turf along the beach.' That shews that the northern boundary line laid down by Mr Hay was above the seashore and upon the links, otherwise there would not have been turf in which to cut a line. The existing wall upon the north side of Mackinlay Park is very strongly built, and appears to be the original wall which was presumably built soon after the feu was granted, and I think that there is little doubt that it substantially follows the line cut by Mr Hay in the turf. The wall stands upon the Links a little back from the point where the Links slope down to the sand of the shore.

"I may here say that the eastern wall, that towards the river, is not built upon the line laid down by Mr Hay, but is further from the river, with the result that the ground enclosed within the walls is a little less than the extent of the feu. I think, however, that the expert evidence shews that that was almost certainly done on account of the large expense which would have been necessary to build the wall upon the softer ground close to the river.

"I now come to the clause to which I have already referred, following the description of the eastern boundary, to the effect that the bank, 'not only along the river, but also along by the sea,' shall remain open and unfeued except to the Aitchisons, and also to the clause immediately following the description of the north boundary, to the effect that if ground is left by the receding of the sea or the river, or otherwise, and the Aitchisons take possession thereof, they shall be bound to pay additional feu-duty.

"The first question is, what is the meaning of the words in the first clause, 'but also along by the sea'? I have already pointed out that the feu lies at the corner of the Links formed by the river and the seashore, and I have also expressed my opinion as to what was meant by the bank of the river. Now, the only natural feature which could be referred to as the bank along by the sea seems to me to be the slope which leads down from the Links to the sand of the shore, which might quite appropriately

Even if it were otherwise, and it could be held that unless there was something in the context to exclude the idea of "sea-beach" being read as equivalent to sea, it might be so read, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that in this case that result could not be arrived at. In saying this I feel bound to express my view that there is much to be said against what the Lord Ordinary does in reading into a blank left in the feu-contract certain words, viz., "the bank of the" whereby he gives a limitation to the grant so far as it relates to the east boundary at the River Esk, and founds on this and the words which follow, to which it is difficult to give an intelligible meaning unless some such words are supplied. I do not think it is competent to guess at words where there is a blank, and to read words in, and if the impossibility of reading what immediately follows in an intelligible sense without inserting words is apparent, then I fear the proper course is to disregard them. But, on the other hand, I am satisfied that all the terms of the feu-contract as fully expressed are quite consistent with be described as a bank. If that is what was referred to, then all the provisions are rendered intelligible and operative, whereas, if that is not what is referred to, the clauses which I have quoted are unintelligible and inofficious, and might as well have been scored out of the contract, and I need hardly say that that construction is to be preferred which gives meaning and effect to all the language used.

"The conclusion to which I come therefore is, that the foreshore was not included in the feu-contract, but that in order to prevent the feuars from being thereby prejudiced, it was agreed that in no event should anyone else be interjected between them and the river or the sea, but that if land was gained from the river or from the sea the feuars should, if they chose to do so, be entitled to take possession of it upon condition of paying feu-duty at the specified rate.

"In regard to the possession which has followed upon the feu-contract, it is only necessary to say that it appears to me not to have been inconsistent with the views which I have expressed as to the rights of parties. The pursuers have, generally speaking, possessed the foreshore in practically every way of which the subject is capable. It is the case, however, that since 1868 onwards the proprietors of Mackinlay Park have from time to time complained of and objected to the removal of sand and gravel from the foreshore ex adverso of their ground. I think, however, that the natural inference from the documentary evidence is that at first the complaints were not based upon alleged property in the foreshore, but upon apprehended injury to land or buildings at Mackinlay Park from inroads of the sea consequent upon removal of banks of sand and gravel from the foreshore. There does not appear to have been any definite claim to the foreshore put forward by the proprietors of Mackinlay Park until 1892, but the correspondence shews that from that date they have claimed right to the foreshore, while the pursuers have maintained that they had no right; that unsuccessful attempts were made to come to a settlement of that and other questions which had arisen between the parties; and that finally the present action was brought.

"Therefore, although the possession alone might not have been conclusive the one way or the other, I repeat that it appears to me to have been certainly not inconsistent with the title as I read it, and I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to decree that the foreshore belongs to them. I am not, however, to be taken as indicating an opinion that the defenders' property does not extend to high-water mark of ordinary spring tides, a question which I understand has been raised in another action."—(His Lordship then dealt with the questions raised as to Rosehall.)

the reading that "sea-beach" as the boundary meant the line at which the land ended and the beach over which the sea flowed began. One of the stipulations seems very plainly to point to this, for the feu-contract bears that "it is hereby expressly agreed and stipulated that if at any time hereafter, either by the receding of the sea or river, or otherwise, the said William and James Aitchison shall take possession of the ground so left, then, and in that case, the said William and James Aitchison shall pay feu for the said increased quantity of ground at the rate of £6 sterling per acre, with free ish and entry thereto from the east and north." It seems to me that that plainly reads as referring to ground freed from the tide and immediately adjoining the ground for which feu-duty was to be paid at that rate from the first, which was described as "a portion of the Links of Fisherrow," an expression which undoubtedly refers to land, and to land never covered by the ordinary spring tide. To read this clause as referring to ground to be uncovered below low-water seems to me to be quite out of the question.

I do not refer at all to the draft with the interlineations and deletions, as I do not think that it is legitimate to look at drafts of deeds for the purpose of interpreting them or modifying them in any way.

Further, while there may be difficulty in giving its full meaning to what follows the blank in the deed to which I have referred, I think it sufficiently and intelligibly appears that what lay to the north "along by the sea" of what was feued was to remain open and unfeued to any but the Aitchisons, they alone having the right to claim feu northwards, if ground came to be left by the sea, and the burgh not being entitled to interpose any feuars between them and the sea—the feuars to have free ish and entry from the north. These stipulations would have been quite unnecessary had the feuars' right been one covering and not one bounded by the beach.

I do not think it to be necessary to notice what took place when questions were raised as to the removal of sand and gravel by persons authorised by the burgh from the shore to the north. Suffice it to say that the complaints made by the feuars of Mackinlay Park were not complaints of interference with or obstruction of property but of alleged danger to the feu as occupied by them from the shore in front of them being removed. Their first claim to anything else but protection to what they were actually occupying seems not to have been made until 1892.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has rightly decided in favour of the pursuers as regards Mackinlay Park. (His Lordship then dealt with the questions as to Rosehall and continued)—I have not thought it necessary to notice the question of possession, as the case seems to me to turn upon the defenders' titles, and not upon any question of possession. There is in the view I take no need to consider the possession alleged by the Magistrates and Council in the case of Mackinlay's Park, as the title of the defenders does not give them the shore.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the decision which the Lord Ordinary has given is right, and ought to be adhered to, and I would move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in the result of the judgment proposed by your Lordship, and think it enough to say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary in the reasons which he has stated.

LORD TRAYNER.—The pursuers of this action seek a declarator that they have the sole and exclusive right to and property in the foreshore ex adverso of two separate properties belonging to the defenders, known respectively as Mackinlay Park and Rosehall. The defenders on the other hand maintain that the foreshore belongs in property to them. Both parties found in support of their several contentions upon their titles and the possession following thereon. In my opinion the determination of the question at issue depends entirely on the construction and effect of the defenders' titles, and is not (as the case stands) affected by the possession had on one side or the other. But this matter of possession bulked so largely in the discussion and occupies so prominent a place in the evidence that it cannot be left unnoticed. I therefore deal with that matter first in order to disembarrass the case of it.

The defenders maintain that their infeftment covers the foreshore. If that is so, then their infeftment gave them (in the words of the old instrument of sasine) real, actual, and corporeal possession of the subject. They needed no possession beyond that to perfect and complete their right. But if the defenders' title did not cover the foreshore, their possession otherwise will not avail them. They have not had such possession of the foreshore as would by prescription confer a right to it as part and pertinent of their subject, even if their title was one "with parts and pertinents," which it is not. So far therefore as the defenders' case is concerned, their title is the only criterion of their right.

Again, the pursuers by their titles had undoubted right to the foreshore and have it still, unless they divested themselves of it in favour of the defenders' authors. Here again we are sent back upon the defenders' title to see what was disponed to them. The pursuers, however, argued, as I understood, that even if the foreshore had been conveyed by them to the defenders' authors, they had by exclusive, uninterrupted, and adverse possession for more than the prescriptive period re-acquired right to the foreshore. I think there is no sufficient proof of such adverse possession as would reinvest the pursuers.

The question therefore between the parties is narrowed down to this, what was conveyed by the pursuers to the defenders' authors? In dealing with this question it is necessary to consider separately the title to Mackinlay Park and to Rosehall, and in regard to the former of these properties the question at issue, as I have above stated, is further narrowed by the fact that the parties only differ (at least in the present process) as to one boundary of the subject conveyed—namely, the boundary to the north. In deciding this question of the northern boundary the Lord Ordinary finds some aid in a consideration of the description of the eastern boundary, and by supplying some words in a blank left in that description in the conveyance to the defenders' authors. I cannot concur with his Lordship in thinking that the Court may supply the missing, or supposed to be missing, words; but I say no more on that subject, because the eastern boundary, whether well or ill defined, is not here in question. What we have to decide is, what is the northern boundary of the defenders' feu? It is thus given in the feu-charter—"On the north by the sea-beach." The pursuers say that such a boundary does not carry any right beyond ordinary high-water mark, and does not therefore include the foreshore. The defenders maintain that a boundary by the "sea-beach" is synonymous with a boundary by the "seashore" or "by the sea," and includes the foreshore. The Lord Ordinary has given effect to the view urged by the pursuers, and I agree with him.

I think it has never yet been decided in express terms that a boundary "by the sea" and one by the "sea-beach" are synonymous or are equivalents. There have been no doubt opinions to that effect expressed by eminent Judges, from whom I venture to differ with great diffidence. But, as I think the question is still an open one, I feel bound to state my own view. It appears to me that the descriptions "sea" and "sea-beach" are not only different in expression but apply to subjects which are distinct and different in themselves. "Sea" and "sea-flood" may be the same, but "sea" and "sea-beach" in my opinion are not. These two things are so distinguished and distinguishable that in ordinary parlance they could never be confounded; and they have not (as yet at least) acquired any technical meaning differing from their ordinary meaning. Their character is different, for the one is water and the other is land. As a boundary one of them is fluctuating, varying with the rise and fall of the tide; the other is practically fixed. Accordingly I am unable to treat "sea" and "sea-beach" as synonymous or convertible terms. If they are not, then what does the boundary "by the sea-beach" confer on the defenders. The ordinary rule is that the thing by which a subject is bounded is excluded from the subject conveyed. It is not part of the subject conveyed, but is outside that subject. Applying this rule, the defenders' property extends to the sea-beach, not beyond it. If the northern boundary had been a wall three-quarters of a foot wide, no one would have suggested that the wall was covered by the conveyance. It makes no difference to my mind that the boundary is three-quarters of a mile broad—that it is a stretch of sand and not a wall of stone and lime. The defenders reach their boundary—that is the limit of their right—when going north they reach the beach. This I take to be the sound construction of the conveyance to the defenders' authors.

But I think there is a plain indication in that conveyance that what I regard as its legal construction is in accordance with the intention of the parties to it. In that part of the dispositive clause which is made somewhat difficult of interpretation through the want of some words bearing upon the eastern boundary, there is a statement that a certain bank "not only along the river" (i.e., the east) "but also along by the sea" (i.e., the north), "shall remain open and unfeued," but that the defenders' authors were to have a preference in the event of feuing. I think this indicates that ground which then was or might become suitable for feuing lay between the ground then conveyed and the sea, and that is inconsistent with the idea that the sea itself was the boundary on the north. I do not lay much stress on this, but it is worthy of being noticed. My opinion, agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, is that the foreshore ex adverso of

No. 56. Dec. 21, 1904. Magistrates of Musselburgh v. Musselburgh Real Estate Co., Limited.

Mackinlay Park was not conveyed by the pursuers to the defenders' authors, and that it is still vested in them. (His Lordship then dealt with the question as to Rosehall.)

LORD MONCREIFF.—As I read the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor he has only disposed of the first two declaratory conclusions of the summons, which are to the effect that the pursuers have the sole and exclusive right, title to, and property in (a) the foreshore ex adverso of Mackinlay's Park; and (b) the foreshore ex adverso of Rosehall, both belonging to the defenders the Musselburgh Real Estate Company, Limited. The remaining conclusions of the summons may have to be disposed of either by the Lord Ordinary or by this Court, but in the meantime I shall deal only with those conclusions which the Lord Ordinary has disposed of.

To deal first with the case of Mackinlay's Park, the first title to it is a feu-contract in favour of William and James Aitchison, dated 18th and 19th April 1826. The feu granted bears to be bounded "on the north by the sea-beach." Now, I may say at once that in a question between subject-superiors and their vassals I am of opinion that, in the absence of distinct conditions in the title or presumptions arising from the natural formation of the ground, or adverse possession which go to limit the grant, a boundary by "the sea-beach" or "seashore" is equivalent to a boundary by "the sea," and gives the feuar a right of property in the foreshore down to low-water mark subject always to public uses. The great bulk of authority is in favour of this view, beginning with the two cases of Culross[1] and ending with Hunter v. Lord Advocate.[2]

It is true that in some of the cases cited the observations of the Judges were obiter in this sense, that the point was conceded, but the opinions are of importance, because the distinguished Judges who delivered them held the point to be settled. I may refer to the case of Campbell v. Brown,[3] in which the boundary of one of the feus was "the seashore," and particularly to the opinion of the first Lord Meadowbank. In the case of Boucher v. Crawford[4] the boundary was "the sea on the north." In that case the Lord Justice-Clerk, referring to the case of Culross,[1] said:—"The Magistrates had there granted a feu bounded by the seashore; a public road intervened, but by certain operations on the shore Geddes was going to make a garden, and the argument was that a distinction was to be made between being bounded by the sea and the seashore. That argument was rejected." His Lordship also refers to the case of Campbell v. Brown,[3] and says—"Even there the property feued was limited in point of extent, yet your Lordships were clear that he was entitled to make what encroachment he chose on the sea. This case appears to me to be imperative. The only doubt was whether any of the operations would interfere with the right of harbour, but it is evident they would not have that effect."

The cases relied on as against the view that a boundary by "the seashore" carries with it a right of property in the foreshore seem to me to have been all decided upon what were, or were considered to be, specialties.

In Smart v. Magistrates of Dundee,[1] the boundary was "the sea-flood," a term not so favourable to the feuar as "the sea" or "the seashore," and it was held not to comprehend the seashore. But in that case, in addition to the ground being within the limits of a burgh which possessed extensive rights of harbour and other rights in the shore, the ground feued was described as being an enclosed yard. Again, in Berry v. Holden[2] the boundary was "the flood-mark," and this was held not to include the shore uncovered by the tide. But in that case also the superior had rights of harbour, piers, and wharfs, and those peculiarities, coupled with the fact that the boundary was "flood-mark" and not "shore," were held sufficient for the decision of the case against the feuar. The next case cited is the case of Todd v. Dunlop,[3] in which the boundary was the "sea-flood," and the case was held to be ruled by the case of Smart.[1]

It is to be observed that all these cases were in the view of the Court which decided Hunter v. Lord Advocate,[4] in 1869, in which, notwithstanding that the boundary was "the sea-flood," the Court decided that the lands being situated on the banks of a navigable river, the superior had no title to alluvial ground subsequently deposited between the feu and the sea.

The only other class of case to which I need refer is that of which the Officers of State v. Smith[5] is an illustration, in which it was held that the feuar's operations on the shore were incompatible with the public uses of the shore.

I have only to add that I find in the first edition of Bell's Prin., sec. 154, published in 1829, the law is stated to be as I understand it; and in the latest edition, sec. 643, the law is stated in similar terms.

I cannot say that the dicta in all the cases can be easily reconciled, but I entertain little doubt that the great balance of judicial authority is in favour of the view which I have expressed.

I have been speaking hitherto on the general question without reference to the specialties of the present case, and I now proceed to consider whether there is anything in the titles of either property to take the case out of the general rule.

I shall deal first with the case of Mackinlay's Park. The pursuers represent a burgh which has certain rights of harbour, as in the cases of Smart[1] and Berry.[2] But it is to be observed that the pursuers sue as Magistrates and not as Harbour Commissioners. Further, they do not maintain that it was beyond their power to grant right to the foreshore, or that the interests of the harbour are affected, although they do found upon their right of harbour, as making it improbable that they should make such a grant.

I may say generally that I agree with the Lord Ordinary as to the terms of the title. I think there is intrinsic evidence that notwithstanding the description of the north boundary as being "the sea-beach," it was not the intention of the Magistrates of Musselburgh to make a grant of anything beyond at most high-water mark. As I read the description of the boundaries of the ground, there must have been at the date of the grant a fringe of ground along the side of the river Esk and along the seashore which it was not the intention of the granters of the deed to convey to their feuars at that time—a bank, however, which admitted of being feued, and which the town undertook not to feu except to William and James Aitchison. Again, it was provided that, if ground was gained from the sea by alluvium, the feuars should pay feu-duty for the increased quantity of ground at the rate of £6 per acre. These conditions are somewhat confused, but I take their meaning to be this, that the feuars should be entitled on payment of the feu-duty named to a feu, not only of the fringe of ground which I have mentioned, but of ground gained by alluvium from the sea—a provision which is not consistent with the idea that the feuars had an unqualified right of property down to low-water mark.

Again, the title bears that the feuars are to have free ish and entry from the north, which would not have been necessary if they had been bounded by the sea on the north. I therefore am inclined to hold that, apart from the proof of possession, there are specialties in this case sufficient to interpret the boundary by "the sea-beach" in a sense adverse to the defenders' claim.

In regard to possession, it is sufficient to say that while possession of the foreshore by the pursuers or those in their right may not have been enough to enable them to prescribe against their own grant, the evidence of possession is considerably stronger in favour of the town than in favour of the defenders, and helps to interpret the grant. It is true that there is evidence that since 1868 the feuars or their agents repeatedly complained of sand and gravel being removed ex adverso of their feu. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary that these complaints mainly related to damage caused or apprehended to the land occupied by the feuars. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment in regard to the Mackinlay Park is right. (His Lordship then dealt with the questions relating to Rosehall.)

Tough v. Macdonald.

OUTER HOUSE.
Ld. Kyllachy.

IN an action at the instance of Charles Tough and others, against William Kid Macdonald and another, the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 8th June 1904, granted decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and found the pursuers entitled to expenses.

The defenders presented a reclaiming note, but instead of the closed record in the action there was appended to the reclaiming note a copy of the closed record in an earlier action between the same parties. Copies of the wrong record were also appended to the boxed copies of the reclaiming note.

On 15th November 1904 the Second Division, proceeding under sec. 18 of the Judicature (Scotland) Act, 1825, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on defenders' reclaiming note against Lord Kyllachy's interlocutor of 8th June 1904—in respect that defenders have failed to box along with the reclaiming note copies of the record in the action, refuse the reclaiming note as incompetent: Find the pursuers entitled to additional expenses, and remit."

The defenders then presented a minute to the Lord Ordinary under sec. 16 of the Administration of Justice and Appeals Act, 1808,* craving leave to reclaim.

The minute set forth:—The defenders instructed their printers to print the reclaiming note against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 8th June 1904, and to append the closed record, which they would obtain from the pursuers' printer, who, according to the ordinary practice, had printed the boxing copies of the closed record at the time the record was closed, and had meantime retained them to await a reclaiming note, if any, by either party. At the same time the defenders' agents wrote to the agents of the pursuers a letter requesting the pursuers' agents to instruct their printers to deliver the boxing copies of the record to the defenders' printers when they sent for them. The pursuers' agents replied that they had so instructed their printer. The defenders' printers applied to the pursuers' printer for the boxing copies accordingly, and received from him what purported to be the closed record in the action. The reclaiming note was thereupon printed, and was boxed and lodged on 21st June 1904 with copies of the record so supplied appended thereto. It was not again seen by the defenders or their agents until the case was called in the Short Roll of the Second Division on 4th November 1904, when it was discovered that the record which had been boxed to their Lordships was not the closed record in the present action. The case was continued in the roll of the Second Division till 15th November 1904, when the reclaiming note was dismissed as incompetent. What had been delivered by the pursuers' printer to the defenders' printers were copies of the closed record in an earlier action between the same parties, before the same Lord Ordinary. The record in that

III. c. 151), enacts, sec. 16,—"If the reclaiming or representing days against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary shall from mistake or inadvertency have expired, it shall be competent, with the leave of the Lord Ordinary, to submit the said interlocutor by petition to the review of the Division to which the said Lord Ordinary belongs; but declaring always that in the event of such petition being presented, the petitioners shall be subjected in the payment of the expenses previously incurred in the process by the other party."

action was closed on 28th February 1903, and after discussion and the pronouncing of an interlocutor disposing of part of the case, and making a remit, the parties came to terms and settled the action in the summer of 1903. The pursuers' printer, by mistake or inadvertence erroneously furnished copies of the record in that action for boxing instead of those which the pursuers' agents had instructed him to supply.

In support of their motion for leave to reclaim, the defenders cited the undernoted authorities.[1]

The pursuers argued;—Leave to reclaim should be refused. The reclaiming days had not expired from "mistake or inadvertency" within the meaning of sec. 16 of the Act of 1808. It was incompetent for the Lord Ordinary to grant leave to reclaim after the Inner-House had written upon a reclaiming note and pronounced a final interlocutor.

On 24th November 1904 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the minute for" the defenders, "and heard counsel, grants leave to reclaim, as craved."*

On 29th November 1904 the defenders presented a second reclaiming note, and on 8th December, in Single Bills, moved that the cause should be sent to the roll.

The pursuers opposed the motion, but in deference to a suggestion from the bench withdrew their objection.
